intention whatsoever to do anything else than give all the assistance I can to the improvement of the bill.

Mr. GARLAND. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and thirty-two minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and (at five o'clock and thirty-two minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 25, 1881.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. FORNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask by unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the amendments of the Senate to the Military Academy appropriation bill. The committee recommend concurrence, and the amendments will not consume more than a moment of time.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Under instructions from the Committee on Appropriations, I am compelled to move to dispense with the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. That requires a two-thirds vote.

The motion was agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

MILITARY ACADEMY BILL.

Mr. FORNEY. I will now ask to be recognized in reference to the Military Academy bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and the House took from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. No. 6614) making appropriation for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes, with amendments.

Mr. FORNEY. The only substantial amendment of the Senate is for one theodolite, $300. Then the aggregate of the appropriation in the paragraph is increased by that amount. I move the amendments of the Senate be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FORNEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments of the Senate were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 340) in reference to the distribution of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD; when the Speaker signed the same.

INTEREST ON THE DISTRICT LOAN.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I move the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, to proceed to the consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill.

Mr. COBB. In the matter of House bill No. 6970, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, that committee has had it under consideration, and has directed me to report it back with a substitute. I ask now by unanimous consent that I may be permitted to make that report, and that the House shall take the matter up for consideration at this time.

The SPEAKER. The title of the bill will be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 6970) to provide for a deficiency in the appropriation for interest on the 3.65 loan of the District of Columbia, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881, and for other purposes.

Mr. COBB. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations to report that bill back with a substitute (H. R. No. 7029) to provide for a deficiency in the appropriation for interest on the 3.65 loan of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and the bill was received, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. COBB. I now move, Mr. Speaker, that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of that bill.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield for that purpose?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I know the bill reported by the gentleman from Indiana from the Committee on Appropriations, and which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, provides for the payment of interest on the 3.65 bonds which mature on the 1st day of February next. If that bill is not passed into a law between this and the 1st day of February the interest on those bonds which the Government has guaranteed will not be paid, and they will go to protest. I will yield, believing there is not a member of the House who will object.

Mr. COBB. I move, then, the House resolve itself into committee for the consideration of that bill.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. CONVERSE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill will be read for information.

The Clerk read as follows:

That to provide for a deficiency in the appropriation for interest on the 3.65 loan of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881, there be, and is hereby, appropriated $162,169.93; one-half thereof to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and the other half out of the revenues of the District of Columbia for the said fiscal year.

Mr. HUNTON. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. This deficiency bill seems to provide for but a single item. Now, is it the intention of the committee to bring in another bill providing for deficiencies generally?

Mr. COBB. It is not the intention to bring in another bill for the payment of interest.

Mr. HUNTON. No; but for other things?

Mr. BLOUNT. It is simply intended to cover this one question, and the committee were pressed by the Treasury Department that this particular sum was needed at once.

Mr. HUNTON. I understand that. But the question I put to the gentleman in charge of this bill is whether it is the intention of the committee to provide for other deficiencies in the future?

Mr. BLOUNT. Certainly.

Mr. HUNTON. Then there will be another deficiency bill?

Mr. BLOUNT. Certainly.

Mr. COBB. The purpose of this bill is very clear. It explains itself. It is to provide for the payment of the interest falling due on the 1st day of next month. It is very important, therefore, that the bill should be passed at once. It is a bill which is concurred in by the Secretary of the Treasury, and also by the Treasurer, Mr. Gilfillan, with whom I talked in reference to the matter this morning. Technically the law providing for this payment may be considered as being a continuing law, but the Department prefers that this special act may be passed to enable it to continue the payment as heretofore.

If no gentleman desires to discuss the merits of the bill, I move that it be read by sections for debate and amendment under the five-minute rule.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The bill was read.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I desire——

Mr. HUMPHREY. If this is for the payment of interest I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. REAGAN. As I understand from the reading of this bill it provides that one-half of this interest shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. COBB. That is the law. The general statute provides that a portion of this interest shall be paid by the United States and one-half by the District of Columbia.

Mr. REAGAN. I knew we had a law requiring the Government to pay one-half of the expenses of the District of Columbia; but I did not know that it extended to the payment of its debts as well.

Mr. COBB. I understand that that is the law as at present in force.

Mr. REAGAN. Do I understand the gentleman that under the law creating the government for the District of Columbia provision is made for this payment?

Mr. COBB. Yes, sir; that is the law as it now exists.

Mr. REAGAN. I never understood that that law, as bad as it is, embraced the payment of interest on the debts of the District of Columbia.

Mr. HUNTON. I will say to the gentleman from Texas that for the last three years just such a provision has been made to pay this interest, and under the organic act creating a form of government for the District.

Mr. COBB. I desire to say further to the gentleman from Texas what I have already remarked, that I think this is a continuing appropriation. There seems to be, however, some doubt about it in the Department, and therefore it was desirable that a bill should be passed.

Mr. HUNTON. And I will say further to the gentleman from Texas that the law authorizing the issue of these bonds is in such terms as places the Government under the obligation of paying the entire interest.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I now renew my motion that the committee rise and report the bill back to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield the floor for that purpose?

Mr. COBB. I yield for that motion. I make the motion myself. I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CONVERSE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill to provide for deficiencies in the appropriation for payment of the interest on the 3.65 bonds of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881, and for other purposes, had instructed him to report the bill back without amendment and recommend its passage.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COBB moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BATTLE MONUMENT, SCHUYLERVILLE, NEW YORK.

Mr. STARIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4451) and that the same be put upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. That requires unanimous consent. The Chair will cause the title to be read, after which objection will be asked for.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 4451) to provide for the erection of a monument at Schuylerville, New York, commemorative of the battle of Saratoga, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill.

There was no objection.

The bill was read at length. It is as follows:

Whereas Horatio Seymour and other patriotic gentlemen of the State of New York did, in the year 1859, organize the "Saratoga Monument Association," under a perpetual charter from the Legislature of said State, whose object was the erection of a fitting memorial on the site of Burgoyne's surrender; and

Whereas the sum of $10,000 has already been donated by the citizens of said State, with which sum said association has been enabled to purchase two acres of land near the mouth of Fish Creek, on the high ground overlooking the meadow where the British laid down their arms at the battle of Saratoga; and

Whereas said association has recently built upon said lot the foundation of the monument, of concrete, forty feet square and eight feet deep, as well as a quarter of the granite plinth or base, (covering the entire foundation,) four and one-half feet high; and the corner stone, ten feet square and two feet high: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the sum of $30,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended by said association, under the direction of its building committee, in erecting at Schuylerville, State of New York, upon said foundation, the monument hereinbefore referred to; the same to be of granite and of the obelisk form; the main shaft to be twenty feet square, and the height one hundred and fifty feet, as designed by J. C. Markham, of New York City, and adopted by said association.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STARIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REPORT ON FISH CULTURE.

Mr. MONROE, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 372) authorizing the Public Printer to print the reports of the United States Fish Commissioner upon new discoveries in regard to fish culture; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Printing, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of further considering the Post-Office appropriation bill.

INTEROCEANIC SHIP-CANAL.

Mr. KING. I wish to announce, Mr. Speaker, that on Wednesday, the 2d of February, I will call up for consideration in the House the joint resolution from the Select Committee on the Interoceanic Ship Canal.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. SMITH, of New Jersey, indefinitely, on account of illness in his family.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

By unanimous consent, leave to print remarks upon the interstate-commerce bill was granted to Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa. [See Appendix.]

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I renew my motion that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to proceed with the consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. CARLISLE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 6972) making appropriation for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes. The Clerk will report the pending paragraph.

Office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General:

For inland mail transportation, namely: For transportation on railroad routes, $9,488,282.

Mr. DWIGHT. I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the desk to come in after the paragraph just read.

Hereafter the Postmaster-General may pay out of the appropriation for transportation on railroad routes to the personal representative of any employé of the railway mail service who may be killed in a railroad accident while on duty, a sum equal to two years' pay of the grade held by him at the time of his death, for the sole benefit of his widow, if there be one, or of his minor children, if there be any, or of his parents, or of the surviving parent, or of any minor brothers and sisters equally, or if there be none, to any sister surviving in any degree dependent upon said deceased for support: Provided, That application for such payment be made by the personal representative within one year after the death of such employé: Provided further, That the benefits of this act shall accrue to the employés burned to death while on duty at or near Tioga Centre Station, New York, on the morning of January 23, 1881.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I make the point of order upon that amendment.

Mr. DWIGHT. I desire to say a word on the subject of this amendment if I may be permitted. I hope, Mr. Chairman, there will be no point of order raised against it, for I believe when it is understood it is one which every member of this House will cheerfully agree to.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I desire to give notice now, that in order that we may complete the consideration of this bill to-day I shall ask that when points of order are raised gentlemen shall confine themselves to the discussion of those points of order, and not speak to the merits of the amendments themselves. I have made the point of order on this amendment.

Mr. DWIGHT. I take it the House will be willing to hear me for a moment.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Provided the gentleman speaks to the point of order. I shall commence with insisting on the application of the rule now, and shall seek to apply it in every case. I shall insist that when points of order are made gentlemen shall confine themselves in their remarks to those points of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York can be heard on the point of order, but not on the merits of the amendment, except by consent.

Mr. DWIGHT. I trust there will be unanimous consent when it is understood what the purpose of this amendment is. The object of this amendment is to make provision that persons who have been killed, as four were in my district the other day while in the postal service of the Government—one of those employés having been in the service but a few days over a month——

Mr. BLACKBURN. I must insist the merits of the amendment are not in discussion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman from New York is merely stating what the nature of his amendment really is. When that is stated the question as to the point of order may be better understood.

Mr. DWIGHT. I take it that this amendment is of a character that no one can really object to it. If not strictly within the rule it might be considered, and if it obtains unanimous consent might become, as it ought to become, a part of the bill. It is well understood there are no employés under this Government who are harder worked, who are more faithful, who are more competent, and who better deserve the consideration of Congress and the country than the mail agents.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the remarks which the gentleman from New York is making are not pertinent to the question of order. The gentleman from Kentucky insists on the point of order.

Mr. DWIGHT. I hope to be able to get unanimous consent, even if the amendment is not strictly within the parliamentary rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands, then, the gentleman from New York is appealing to the gentleman from Kentucky to withdraw his point of order.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I cannot. I not only insist upon the point of order, but upon the Chair ruling every gentleman down to the discussion of the point of order.

Mr. DWIGHT. I hope that no gentleman upon this floor will more readily consent than the gentleman from Kentucky that this class of employés shall have justice done them.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I would rather amend the pension laws. We have not yet a half million pensioners on the rolls, and I would rather elaborate the pension laws. I insist on the point of order.

Mr. DWIGHT. Will the gentleman object to another section being added to this bill which shall include the provisions of this amendment?

Mr. BLACKBURN. If it is amenable to the point of order I certainly shall.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to speak to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan will proceed.

Mr. CONGER. This is an appropriation for carrying the United States mail on railroads, in postal cars, under the direction and control of an agent of this Government. It is admitted always that the committee may make amendments, providing the mode of applying the money, directing how it shall be applied, and stating under what conditions any appropriation is made. I think there is no question about that proposition. This looks to a condition where the railroad company receives this pay which we appropriate in this bill for a certain service, that service consisting in carrying a mail and carrying it safely, and providing a postal car suitable and proper for this business, the very contract with them providing that they shall safely carry the agent of the Government to handle and control that mail; that if they fail to carry safely the mail, the car, or the officer of the Government who, by the direct terms of the contract, is requirred to accompany the mail and take charge of it, they shall not receive the pay in full under their contract, and a portion of it shall be paid for the injury.

Now, if the chairman please, suppose there was introduced an amendment here that if any railroad company through fault or negligence of its own—and there are such provisions—failed to deliver the mail within the time and thus failing should receive less than the amount of their contract; suppose that was put in this bill, no one would pretend such a provision was subject to a point of order. Suppose a penalty was imposed upon the railroad company for the loss of a mail under any circumstances whatever, who will pretend that that will not come within the proper power of this committee in the way of an amendment?

The proposition of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. DWIGHT,] as I understand it, is that a part of the money appropriated in this bill shall, under certain circumstances, be withheld from the contractors carrying the mails for some supposed fault, or what the Committee of the Whole or the House or the Congress may suppose to be a wrong to others, and shall be paid to the person injured by them while carrying the mails. I submit that that method of directing the manner of paying money appropriated has been adopted by this House from time immemorial. It is a condition of payment and is not subject to a point of order.

The expediency of adopting such a proposition is another question; but a point of order cannot reach it. It has always been held that in an appropriation bill we may by a proviso or condition determine how the money so appropriated shall be used. Our laws are full of such provisions. "Provided that none of such money shall be paid" for such and such a purpose. "Provided that so much of this money shall be paid" for some other purpose. That is all there is of this proposition. The point of order does not reach this case. The judgment of the Committee of the Whole as to the expediency of adopting such a provision or condition of payment is not subject to the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. REAGAN. The expenditure of this money for the objects pointed out by the laws is one thing; the making provision for giving two years' pay to representatives of public officers not now entitled by law to such pay is another question.

Let me illustrate my meaning in this way: suppose I introduce an amendment providing that a mechanic in the employment of the Government, who is not in any sense a public officer, shall be entitled when he dies to two years' pay of the ordinary wages he received from the Government. There would be more justice and more virtue in such a proposition as that than in the one now submitted.

We first prescribe the duties and fix the compensation of certain persons, and men seek such employment because it is far more profitable than the ordinary vocations of life. It is then proposed that we shall adopt the idea that because these persons hold positions more valuable to them than employment in the ordinary vocations of life, that shall be considered a reason for a new law to pay two years' compensation to their representatives in case they die while holding the office. The whole thing seems to me to be strangely monstrous.

Mr. DWIGHT. Men who enter the service of the Government to preserve its existence have provision made by the consent of all for compensation to them in certain cases on account of the extra hazards which they take in behalf of their country. The same provisions should be made in reference to these mail agents, every one of whom takes his life in his hands when he enters upon this peculiarly hazardous employment, as demonstrated in the case to which I have referred, where four men lost their lives——

Mr. BLACKBURN. I do not like to be discourteous, but I must insist that the discussion shall be confined to the point of order.

Mr. DWIGHT. I am replying to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] who gave what he considered reasons against the adoption of this amendment.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I deny the right of any member——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was about to call the attention of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] to the fact that he was overstepping the limits of debate upon a point of order.

Mr. REAGAN. I was simply giving an illustration in reply to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.]

Mr. DWIGHT. And I was simply replying to the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN,] who made an argument against the amendment, and which was not objected to by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACKBURN.]

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am not willing that the debate upon the point of order shall drift into a discussion upon the merits of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will endeavor to confine the debate within proper limits. It has undoubtedly been held, as suggested by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER,] that provisions may be inserted in appropriation bills, or in amendments to appropriation bills, directing the manner in which the money so appropriated shall be expended. But no such provisions have ever been held to be in order unless they were in accordance with existing law or unless they retrenched expenditures.

The amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. DWIGHT] does not provide that the money which it proposes to pay to the heirs or representatives of these route agents shall be deducted from the compensation to be paid to the railroads for carrying the mails. It simply provides that two years' pay may be paid out of the appropriation for railway transportation; and that may create a deficiency in such appropriation. It does not retrench expenditures, and it does change existing law without retrenching expenditures. The Chair is bound, therefore, to sustain the point of order.

Mr. DWIGHT. I desire, then, to so modify the amendment that the amount or amounts to be paid under it shall be deducted from the compensation to be paid to railroad companies for this service.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment would still not be in order unless it retrenched expenditures in one of three ways set forth in Rule XXI. If the proposition changes existing law at all, if offered by a member upon this floor and not by instructions of a committee, it must retrench expenditures in one of three ways. The provision of the rule is as follows:

> Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order except such as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States, by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States, or by the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill.

The gentleman will see that under that clause, which is very different from Rule 120 of the old rules, when a member on the floor, without the instructions of a committee, offers an amendment changing existing law, it must comply with the conditions to which the Chair has just referred, contained in Rule XXI. The Chair therefore rules the amendment not in order.

The Clerk was proceeding to read the next paragraph, but was interrupted by Mr. DWIGHT, who said: I ask that the clause may be so amended as to reduce expenditures.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can offer his amendment in any form that he chooses, and then the Chair will rule upon it.

Mr. DWIGHT. I ask that the clause be amended so as to make an appropriation of one dollar less to the Department.

Mr. BLACKBURN. We have passed that clause of the bill; the Clerk is reading the succeeding clause.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] that the gentleman from Arkansas, [Mr. DUNN,] whom the Chair now recognizes, rose before the Clerk commenced reading. Of course the custom is not to pass from a clause so long as any gentleman is claiming the floor.

Mr. DUNN. I desire to put a question to the gentleman from Kentucky. In the report of the Postmaster-General, on page 82, I find this statement:

> The new railroad arrangements to Texas, via New Orleans, and the Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railroad, will give that State improved and sufficient postal facilities; and the course of events clearly indicates that two daily trains will have to be placed on the line of road from Saint Louis, via Little Rock, to Texarkana, in order to secure to that road its proportion of the Texas business; but, for the present, the State of Arkansas, and more especially the city of Little Rock, is without proper mail facilities, and provision should be made for a second daily train between Saint Louis and Little Rock.

Now, yesterday, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARDY] asked the gentleman from Kentucky whether any appropriation for this item had been carried into the bill reported by the committee. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] made, finally, this answer:

> I think the question of the gentleman from Missouri would have been in better time had it been reserved till we reached that clause of the bill; but as he has made it, and as I am endeavoring to answer it, I may go one step further and say that in the very same annual report in which this recommendation is made by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General we have estimates for the service for the next fiscal year; and I undertake to say to the House that we have not only failed or refused to reduce these estimates, but upon the figures of the Post-Office officials themselves, upon their own records and books, we have granted to that Department of the service every dollar that the estimate calls for and $31,000 besides.

Now, inasmuch as this item is not carried into the bill as a special item, I desire to ask the gentleman whether the appropriation proposed in this paragraph is sufficient to provide for that additional service asked for and which the Postmaster-General says is necessary to give the State of Arkansas proper and ample mail facilities?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am very glad to have an opportunity to answer the question and to answer it in the affirmative. The figures of this bill demonstrate that the Post-Office Department will have ample provision for the service upon the railroad to which the gentleman now alludes. In order to prove this let me refer to the figures. Last year we appropriated in bulk $9,665,000 for inland mail transportation by rail. Of that sum, however, $350,000 was to be used for special facilities on trunk-lines. In this bill the necessary and special facilities on trunk-lines are estimated and appropriated for in a special item, so that this no longer constitutes a part of the bulk appropriation for inland transportation by rail. The estimate of the Post-Office Department as submitted to us for this item was $10,288,282. But the officials of the Department who were brought before the subcommittee stated to us that in that estimate they had given the Government no credit for the amount of money that was to come back to us under the operation of the act of 1879 applying to certain Pacific railroads.

We sent for the Sixth Auditor, and from him we learned that the amount of money received under the operation of the act of 1879, as repayment to the Government by the Pacific railroad companies for interest upon their bonds which the Government had paid, amounted to $881,000; so that all we had to do was to take the estimate of the Department for this item, deduct $881,000, and appropriate the remainder, which would, according to the statement of the officers of the Department, give them every dollar that they asked for. In point of fact we did not deduct $881,000 from the estimate, we deducted $800,000; so that the clause of the bill now under consideration does in fact appropriate every dollar that the Post-Office Department asked for this service and $81,000 besides.

Now, I am aware that the estimated cost of the service to which the gentleman from Arkansas alludes is $75,000; but I am also credibly informed that it is agreed and held that $50,000 will probably be sufficient to give the second daily mail upon that line. I say that according to the report of the Postmaster-General it should have been included in his estimate; for he makes special mention of it in his annual report and speaks of the necessity of that service. But even if this is not true—even if this item is not included in the general estimate, as of course it should have been when the Postmaster-General was treating of the subject and urging its necessity—then, I say that there is still ample provision in this bill, because the Department has every dollar of its estimate and $81,000 besides.

Mr. DUNN. Let me ask the gentleman a further question. Did the committee add the $81,000 to provide for any special item on any particular trunk-line which was brought to the attention of the committee.

Mr. BLACKBURN. By no means.

Mr. DUNN. Then that $81,000 may as well be appropriated to this as any other necessary part of the service.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Yes, sir; and according to the official report of the Post-Office Department it had better be appropriated for this than any other, because this is the road which the Department itself has singled out in the annual report, especially urging the necessity of an appropriation for it.

Mr. DUNN. Then, as I understand it, the committee does not direct any particular sum to be applied to any road, but considers that it has made ample provision for this as for all others.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Most assuredly. If there is to be any distinction or difference drawn against any road or in favor of any road, the committee feel the discrimination is in favor of the road the gentleman from Arkansas inquires about from the fact that ample provision is made and the Post-Office Department has called the attention of the committee and Congress to the necessity of the provision.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Is there any amendment pending?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from Arkansas was asking the gentleman from Kentucky a question as to the clause and that the gentleman from Kentucky has just completed his answer.

Mr. DWIGHT. I move to strike out in line 58, after the word "eighty," the word "two," so it will read:

For inland mail transportation, namely: For transportation on railroad routes, $9,488,280.

And then I propose to insert the amendment which I have sent up, that any amount which may be paid any individuals under the provisions thereof shall be deducted from the amount which may be due the railroad company or companies upon which the accidents resulting in injury may occur.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I reserve all points of order on that amendment, and I now ask that the Clerk shall report it so we may understand it.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 58 strike out the word "two:" so it will read:

"Office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General:

"For inland mail transportation, namely: For transportation on railroad routes, $9,488,280."

And add the following:

"Hereafter the Postmaster-General may pay out of the appropriation for transportation on railroad routes to the personal representative of any employé of the railway mail service, who may be killed in a railroad accident while on duty, a sum equal to two years' pay of the grade held by him at the time of his death, for the sole benefit of his widow, if there be one, or of his minor children, if there be any, or of his parents or of the surviving parent or of any minor brothers and sisters equally, or if there be none, to any sisters surviving in any degree dependent upon said deceased for support: Provided, That application for such payment be made by the personal representative within one year after the death of such employé: Provided further, That the benefits of this act shall accrue to the employés burned to death while on duty at or near Tioga Centre Station, New York, on the morning of January 23, 1891. The amount that may be paid to individuals under the provisions hereof shall be deducted from the amount which may be due the railroad company or companies upon which the accidents resulting in injury may occur."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair supposes the gentleman has put it in a form to bring it within the rule, as it covers the amount here provided, and proposes it shall be taken from the compensation made to the railroad companies for carrying the mails.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I do not think this amendment is one whit less amenable to the point of order, for it certainly contemplates an increase of expenditure, unless it be that provision of the amendment which throws the burden of payment on the railroad company in the face of a contract entered into by the Federal Government with such company, but which I imagine no court of law in this land would hold to be enforceable.

But, sir, I demand a division of the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has that right, but he will indicate where he wishes to divide the proposition.

Mr. REAGAN. Under what rule is this held to be in order?

The CHAIRMAN. Rule XXI. The gentleman has modified his amendment and reduced it to the amount included under the bill, and he provides the payment to the heirs of route agents shall come out of the compensation provided to the railroad companies for carrying the mails, and the Chair is inclined to think that that brings it technically within the rule.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to add there is another point, that it is not germane to the provisions of the bill.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I have reserved all points of order, and we will argue that point when we come to that division. I now ask the Clerk to read the first division of the amendment on which the vote will first occur.

The Clerk read as follows:

Hereafter the Postmaster-General may pay out of the appropriation for transportation on railroad routes to the personal representatives of any employé of the railway mail service who may be killed in a railroad accident while on duty a sum equal to two years' pay of the grade held by him at the time of his death, for the sole benefit of his widow, if there be one, or of his minor children, if there be any, or of his parents or of his surviving parent, or of any minor brothers and sisters equally, or if there be none, to any sisters surviving in any degree dependent upon said deceased for support.

Mr. REAGAN. While it may be, Mr. Chairman, that this does not increase the expenditure, it cannot be assumed that it does not change the law and is not new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will observe under the language of the rule it reduces the amount covered by the bill.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Is it germane?

The CHAIRMAN. That is a question upon which the Chair has some difficulty. The clause relates to appropriations for the compensation of railway companies carrying mails, and this seems to relate to that by providing it shall come out of that compensation.

Mr. REAGAN. The provision of the rule is:

Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. Or——

Mr. REAGAN. Yes. It goes on—

Or by the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill.

But still it must be germane. It must relate to the objects of this bill. It seems to me that the test as to whether the amendment can be admitted is, is it germane to the bill or does it provide new legislation which is not germane?

No one will assume that there is any law in existence authorizing the payment of two years' salary to this classs of employés in case of death resulting from injuries while in that service.

That is undoubtedly new legislation. No law exists for it. The bill makes no provision for such payment. But it is not only not germane to the bill, but provides new legislation imposing new burdens upon the Treasury under a technical proposition to change the amount of the appropriation for this purpose a few hundred dollars, which is simply and plainly an evasion. I desire to resist that class of items and this character of legislation because I do not understand that it is our true policy to create an aristocracy of office-holders or to give them any special privileges under our system of government.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the amendment is technically within the rule, and therefore it is in order. Gentlemen can discuss the merits of the proposition itself.

Mr. DWIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I did propose to say something in answer to the remarks of the gentleman from Texas; but as the Chair has overruled the point of order there is no occasion for my doing so.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has five minutes in support of the amendment if he so desires.

Mr. DWIGHT. Now, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this proposition, made by the amendment I have offered, is one that will commend itself fully to every member of this House as well as to the entire country. It has been apparent to every observer of the railway mail service of the country that it is now in the hands of able, intelligent men, who perform thoroughly, industriously, and faithfully their duties and that they are poorly paid. It is also understood thoroughly well that the business in which they are engaged is peculiarly one involving a great deal of hazard, as is demonstrated by what has induced me to present this amendment.

Now, in the county of Tioga, but a few miles from the town in which I live and in the district I have the honor to represent, an accident occurred on Sunday morning resulting in the death of four of these agents. The cars were running along at the ordinary speed upon a comparatively level section of country where the embankments were small when an axle was broken, resulting in throwing the mail car from the track whereby these four agents of the postal railway service were killed. One of these employés was a young man for whom I secured the appointment within the last few weeks, and he was in the faithful discharge of his duties at the time of his death. His friends and family dependent upon his services for their livelihood, and which they had a right to expect, are deprived of realizing what may be necessary for their sustenance and support, as already stated.

He was in the faithful discharge of his official duties and the Department has no discretion whatever except in this respect. It happened that his death occurred between twelve and one o'clock on Sunday morning, so that under the ruling of the Department he had entered upon a new day, and the only discretion the head of the railway service has is to allow his family to have one day's pay. That is all that the Department can allow him. There is no method under the law by which he can receive or his family can receive anything whatever from the Government because of his death. I submit to this House whether they want the employés and agents of this character to discharge the duties which they are performing in the railway mail service of the country, in which every citizen is interested and which is known to be extra-hazardous, without making some reasonable compensation for disasters which are constantly occurring of this character. I take it that gentlemen will not search about to see if there is not some technical objection under the rules of this House which they can interpose to defeat what would simply seem to be an act of justice to these employés.

As I have said before, Mr. Chairman, they are poorly paid. They are growing old in the service at best. There is very little increase in their compensation from year to year, and little or no opportunity for promotion, and yet the Congress of the United States gravely discusses the question whether or not they will make some reasonable provision by which the families of these men may be compensated where their lives have been sacrificed in the service of the country. In my judgment, Mr. Chairman, there should be provision made for such men in such cases as this. Provision is made for a man who takes up his musket and marches into the front of the battle for the purpose of preserving the institutions of his country. If a case should arise where such man claims justice by the gratitude of the country he is placed upon the pension-rolls and receives a remuneration or some compensation, or his family is paid for the loss of his services in case of his death. But if his employment be of the nature such as these men to whom I am now referring, where life is sacrificed in the pursuance of his duty, the country has made no provision; and I now ask this Congress to provide that something shall be done for men who are sacrificed in the public service as the men were to whom I have called the attention of this committee.

Mr. REAGAN rose.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I will ask the gentleman from Texas to yield one minute's time to me.

Mr. REAGAN. I have only five minutes myself.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I wanted a minute to reply to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Chairman, I think the House would do well to give its attention to this subject now before us. It is urged that because of the character of the service in which these agents are engaged in the railway mail distribution that they should be entitled to peculiar and special consideration from the Government. It has already been urged that the officers of the Army and Navy, because their lives have been devoted to the service of the country, when they grow old should have provision made for them. The making of such a provision has been a matter of modern action by Congress. It has been also urged that gentlemen engaged in the judicial service of the United States, after they have reached an age that enabled them to be retired, should be compensated for their services. In each of these cases Congress has undoubtedly gone upon the idea that these gentlemen had devoted their lives to the public service until they were worn out and too old to seek other business to enable them to live in that degree of ease that a great government ought to provide for those who have devoted a life-time to the public service and to the public good.

But here we have a proposition to take up the clerks in the mail service on the railroads, and in case of accident to give them two years' pay. Now, Mr. Chairman, what is there to distinguish this from its application to postmasters? It was said by the gentleman from New York that this service had some danger in it. Granted; but the employments are sought, anxiously, earnestly sought, by every employé because the pay is better, the service more profitable, the means of benefiting themselves and their families better; and because they have been successful in securing employments which pay them better, which enable them better to take care of themselves and families than in the ordinary vocations of life, shall their good fortune be the basis for this bounty of the Government? What can be said in behalf of them that could not be said in behalf of any other class of officers, that could not be said in favor of any class of mechanics and agricultural laborers in this country?

This, sir, looks simply to going a little further in making an aristocracy of officers in this country, and making their good fortune, their promotion, the honors and emoluments they receive a reason for giving them advantages over citizens that have failed to acquire the positions in which they have been more fortunate than their neighbors. I object to this because I trust that we are to make no more needless departures from the character of our Government and institutions by creating classes with special privileges which cannot be accorded to others, when those privileges rest in the one instance upon the good fortune which is not enjoyed in the other instance.

The gentleman from New York said that the families of these men looked to their services, and if they were deprived of their lives they lost their services. Such may be said of every farmer, of every mechanic, whatever his station or condition in life, that if the husband dies the family is left without the assistance of their labor.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I would like to have the amendment read before I move to amend by striking out the last word.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I move to strike out the last word.

Upon a direct proposition to pension dependent surviving relatives of postal clerks or route agents who may be killed in the performance of their duty, or to give a pension to those that are injured in the performance of their duty if it were to come on its own merits, even then I might hesitate before I could get my own consent to support it; although I acknowledge there are some instances where very great hardship is inflicted upon this class of employés, but I take it for granted the gentleman from New York is not in earnest about this amendment. If so, it is certainly too broad.

Mr. DWIGHT. I wish to say to the gentleman from Illinois I never was more in earnest in my life.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Then I will say the gentleman is in earnest.

Mr. DWIGHT. I am surprised the gentleman from Illinois should have made the statement he did.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I do not yield further. I know the gentleman is in earnest.

I understand that in New York as in Illinois, and I apprehend in most States, by statute an action is given to the personal representative of any one who is killed, perhaps other than an employé of the road, and in some instances to the employé, to recover from the company not exceeding $5,000. What effect this legislation would have on that I do not know. Nor does the gentleman from New York in his amendment have any reference as to whether death was caused by the negligence of the employé. All cases cannot stand upon the same ground. I think the wiser way, if you will think about it a minute, is to defeat this amendment and let the bill stand without it; and then in due time if the gentleman believes legislation ought to be had pensioning these parties, let it be prepared carefully and let it receive deliberate action on the part of the House.

Mr. DWIGHT. I had thought my sincerity in this matter was clearly understood. I am surprised at the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I did not intend to surprise the gentleman from New York.

Mr. WARNER rose.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I move the committee rise for the purpose of limiting debate to one minute on this amendment.

Mr. WARNER. I desire only to be heard for two minutes.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. WARNER. It seems to me we would be entering upon dangerous ground by adopting such an amendment as this. Is it proposed to allow a clerk, for instance, in the Executive Department to decide whether a route agent has been killed without his contributory negligence or without his fault? Again, the question arises in my mind whether or not the adoption of this amendment would not fix absolutely the damages which a railway company may be liable for to a route agent, and fix it at two years' salary. In many of the States, under State laws, the railways are already liable in a fixed sum in case of death, and a much larger sum than this. Are there to be two penalties or two assessments of damages, one by the United States, and the other by the State? If that cannot be, then it certainly is not in the interest of the route agent to have this amendment passed.

Mr. ROBESON. I desire to say one word.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I give notice that after the gentleman from New Jersey has spoken I will ask that the committee rise for the purpose of closing debate.

Mr. BAYNE. I hope that will not be done. I desire to be heard briefly on this amendment.

Mr. ROBESON. Let us understand this thing. We require these officers of the Government to ride upon the railroads in discharge of their duties. It may be doubtful whether they ride under a contract with the railroad company or not, and if they do not it may be doubtful whether they can call upon that railroad company for compensation. But by this bill we provide that the railroad company shall have a certain compensation for the duty in which these agents of our Government are employed; and in making that provision we provide that that compensation shall be paid to them upon condition that they take good care of our officers who are committed to their charge. If they do not take good care of them, then we say as a condition of this appropriation that these employés in a moderate capacity, who may not have the power through their poor representatives to sue gigantic corporations, shall be paid through the beneficent action of our Government when it makes that contract. Now, that is the question for us to decide here.

Mr. BAYNE. I want to say one word.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I want to end debate on such an amendment as this at some time or other.

Mr. BAYNE. I will occupy but a minute or two.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] yield?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will yield for a minute.

Mr. BAYNE. There is a case which occurred in my district very similar to the one that occurred in the district of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. DWIGHT.] There was an accident on the Western Pennsylvania Railroad, and in that accident a number of persons were killed. A number of suits were brought against the railroad company, and judgment was recovered in every instance but one; and that was where the widow and children of a route agent brought suit against the railroad company for the loss of the father and husband. That case was taken to the supreme court of the State of Pennsylvania, and that court decided that under a law of the State which prevents the employés of railroad companies from bringing suits against the companies for the recovery of damages sustained even in consequence of the negligence of the companies, no recovery on behalf of the family of the route agent could be had. I have brought that case here with a view of certifying it to the Supreme Court of the United States, in order that the Constitution and laws of the United States may afford some relief if the courts of the States will not.

I think that the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. DWIGHT] is one that ought to pass this House. These young men give the very best years of their lives to this service; they give their fresh, tender young lives to it. When they become old they are not able to live on what they have saved in this service, because the compensation is not adequate. I think this would be a just and righteous measure, and should receive the universal approbation of the members of this House.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am sorry the minute of the gentleman lasted so long. I wish to say that if it be the purpose of this House to establish a civil list, I hope it will be done by an independent bill, and not in the shape of a rider upon a Post-Office appropriation bill. There are many gentlemen in this House who are on record as being opposed to putting riders on appropriation bills.

I now move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing debate on this paragraph and amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is now exhausted upon the pending amendment.

Mr. BLACKBURN. There will probably be another amendment offered and debated, unless the committee rises. I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CARLISLE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 6972) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of further considering the Post-Office appropriation bill. And pending that motion, I move that all debate upon the pending section and amendments thereto be limited to one minute.

Mr. PAGE. I presume the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] does not mean to exclude any further debate on this entire section.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Why not?

Mr. PAGE. I suppose the gentleman means upon the paragraph.

Mr. BLACKBURN. What does the gentleman call the section? I mean upon the paragraph ending with line 59.

Mr. PAGE. That is the paragraph, and I do not object to that.

The motion to limit debate was agreed to.

The motion to go into Committee of the Whole was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. CARLISLE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole and resumes the consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill. By order of the House all debate upon the paragraph under consideration and amendments thereto is limited to one minute.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. DWIGHT] by striking out all after the words "children if any" down to the proviso. My object in moving that amendment is this: if adopted it will give to the wife of the party who loses his life, if he has any, and if none, then to the minor children, if any, two years' pay. I am utterly opposed to going further than that in giving aid in circumstances like those set forth in the amendment.

There is another point, and that is, that it does not seem to me that these agents are such employés of the railroad company as to prevent a recovery by their personal representatives from the railroad company of damages limited to $5,000 in case of death.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House all debate upon the pending paragraph has been exhausted.

The question was upon the amendment of Mr. HUMPHREY, to strike out of the amendment of Mr. DWIGHT the following:

Or of his parents or of the surviving parent, or of any minor brothers and sisters, or, if there be none, of any sisters surviving in any degree dependent upon the said deceased for support.

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. HUMPHREY, and it was not agreed to, upon a division—ayes 30, noes 64; no further count being called for.

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. DWIGHT; and upon a division there were—ayes 31, noes 74.

So (no further count being called for) the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For railway post-office car service, $1,426,000. And hereafter when any railroad company fail or refuse to provide railway post-office cars when required by the Post-Office Department said company shall have its pay reduced 10 per cent. on the rates fixed in section 4002 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by act of July 12, 1876, entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes," and as further amended by the act of June 17, 1878, entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes;" and section 5 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1879, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I move to amend by striking out at the end of this paragraph the following words:

And section 5 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1879, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

I call the attention of the gentleman in charge of this bill to the fact that the lines which I propose to strike out have been inserted by an error, a similar repealing provision being contained in the law making appropriations for the postal service for the current fiscal year.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The gentleman is correct. The amendment should be adopted.

The amendment was agreed to

Mr. BRIGHAM. I move to amend by inserting after the words "Post-Office Department," in line 63, the words, "or shall fail or refuse to provide suitable safety-heaters therefor, with such number of saws and axes to each car for use in case of accident as may be required by the Post-Office Department."

Mr. BLACKBURN. I think there will be no objection to that amendment.

Mr. BRIGHAM. I would like to occupy a few moments to justify the introduction of this amendment. It seems to me that some of the railway companies which carry the mail of the United States have for years violated the law. Section 4005 of the Revised Statutes has made it the duty of these companies to properly fit up, furnish, heat, and light the cars in which the railway postal business of the country is transacted. In consequence of the violation of this requirement the people have every now and then heard the sickening news of the wrecking of railway trains, the overturning and burning of postal cars, and the roasting alive of men working in them. Three times this winter—once in Missouri, once in North Carolina, and again only a few hours ago on the Erie Railway, in the State of New York—have these disastrous calamities occurred.

Now, the Government exacts from its postal clerks and mail agents the most severe service. The labors they perform are of the most arduous and exhausting kind, and are rendered under very dangerous conditions. They work in cars heated by ordinary stoves and lighted with oil-lamps—cars which usually are the nearest to the engine. In consequence of these facts, the Postmaster-General and the superintendent of railway service have repeatedly urged the railway companies to a humane compliance with the law; but the companies have not responded.

Now, this amendment touches the soul of a railway company, because it pricks the pocket, where the railway company carries its soul. By this 10 per cent. reduction of compensation in case of violation of the law, the railway companies, we think, will be persuaded to obedience. This amendment is humane; and the committee, I hope, will consider it germane to this bill. It does not increase expenses. If the amendment be adopted and be complied with, then in case of accident, the men working in these cars, unless they are killed outright or stunned into insensibility, will be able to seize these tools and hew out their own salvation. The amendment, if adopted, will, I claim, tend to save valuable lives, and will also tend to save from destruction the mail matter with which the mail cars are stored.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BRIGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I have great sympathy with the amendment, and think its object entirely proper; but I want to ask whether or not the terms of the amendment are such as to confine the companies to the use of any particular kind of heater.

Mr. BRIGHAM. Mr. Chairman, it does not do anything of that kind; it simply requires the companies to provide "suitable safety-heaters." I will state to the committee that the safety-heater is simply a stove under which ten, fifteen, or twenty gallons of water are placed; and pipes are so disposed that in case of the overturning of the stove the water floods the fire and puts it out. Axes and saws are provided so that the men may release themselves if need be, and also save the contents of the car. The amendment does not provide for any particular heater; that is left an open matter.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. BRIGHAM, it was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For necessary and special facilities on trunk-lines, $400,000.

Mr. CLARDY. I move to amend by inserting after the word "hundred" the words "and fifty," so as to make the amount of this appropriation $450,000. While it may be true as stated by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] in answer to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN]——

Mr. BLACKBURN. I reserve a point of order on this amendment.

Mr. CLARDY. While it may be true that the service alluded to by the gentleman from Arkansas has been provided for in the paragraph commencing on line 56, yet inasmuch as the Department holds that this service, if provided for at all, must be provided for in the item which we are now considering, I offer this amendment to increase the amount of the appropriation $50,000; $450,000, as I understand, is the amount recommended by the Department.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BLACKBURN. I have reserved a point of order on the amendment, but I am perfectly willing the gentleman from Arkansas should be heard.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, I can foresee that Arkansas and Southeast Missouri are to be sufferers under a difference of construction placed upon this bill and these items of appropriations by the committee, or the gentleman from Kentucky in behalf of the committee, on the one hand, and by the Post-Office Department on the other hand. The Postmaster-General tells us that Arkansas has not sufficient mail facilities, and that this item of increased allowance ought to be made. The gentleman from Kentucky in charge of the bill says that while it is true that this item as a specialty has not been carried in the bill, nor has the Postmaster-General carried the item into his estimates, yet as the committee in a different item allowed $80,000 more than was asked for by the Department, we must look to that fund for the needed relief for the full measure of mail service that we need and are entitled to.

The Second Assistant Postmaster-General, on the other hand, says this needed facility for Arkansas must come under the head of a special arrangement and special increase of service, and that unless it is carried into that item he cannot give it. Now, between these two constructions Arkansas is to become the sufferer and be deprived of that just proportion of mail service to which she is confessedly entitled. I ask why Arkansas should be singled out from all the States and Territories in the Union as a State to be denied sufficient mail facilities? The State of Texas has two great lines of double daily mail service to the south of it. All the other States and all other localities are provided for, but we are to be denied our mail service because of this difference of construction between the committee and the Post-Office Department.

This amendment, Mr. Chairman, does not increase the appropriation beyond the estimates of the Department. We are told on all hands if it be adopted we can then get the needed facility. I hope the committee will give it to us. There is certainly no good reason why the people of Arkansas should be made to suffer this great deprivation, and I therefore hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will withdraw the point of order; but I wish to say this, Mr. Chairman: the gentleman from Arkansas and the gentleman from Missouri are mistaken. The amendment the gentleman from Missouri offers, which is an increase of $50,000 on this item of the bill, is utterly valueless to him for the purpose which he and the gentleman from Arkansas avow. There is no room for any difference of construction between the Post-Office Department and this committee, or between that Department and me, or between that Department and anybody.

We know until now there has never been any such item as this incorporated in appropriation bills at all. This appropriation for necessary and special facilities on trunk-lines is a new item in the bill. As I stated to the House this morning, it was embraced in the bulk appropriation last year for the inland mail transportation by railroad, but there was a provision in last year's bill which allowed $350,000 of that nine million and odd dollars to be taken out of that bulk fund and used for this purpose. Now it is estimated for in a separate item. It is appropriated for in a separate item, and instead of $350,000 which was allowed to be used that way during the present fiscal year, this bill offers $400,000 for this purpose. The road and the service which the gentleman from Arkansas and the gentleman from Missouri want to cover by this increase of appropriation, can never be touched under this head for this appropriation, for necessary and special facilities on trunk-lines simply look to and embrace expedition of schedule in the delivery of mail by fast trains on the great trunk-lines in the country.

Mr. DUNN. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Certainly; but remember I have only five minutes.

Mr. DUNN. The gentleman will observe by the report of the Post-Office Department that in order to give this increased service they must give additional compensation to enable that road to run; and therefore——

Mr. BLACKBURN. I have read the report of that Department as closely, perhaps, as any member in the House. I know the Department—and if the gentleman wants plain language I will give it to him—I know the Second Assistant Postmaster-General has sought to hold the very demand which the gentleman from Arkansas and the gentleman from Missouri are making on the House with this road as an argumentum in terrorem over this committee in this Congress to extort the full measure of his estimates. I know that.

Mr. DUNN. It is necessary; and that is all there is of it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. With all courtesy to the gentleman, I cannot yield further of my five minutes. I know these gentlemen came to me this morning and told me they could get their service if we would yield to the exaction of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General to the extent of $50,000 for special facilities. I know under the law he dare not, and the past proves he dare do all that is right and much that is questionable—I know under the law he dare not appropriate one dollar covered under that estimate of this bill for the service which the gentlemen seek to protect. It is not special facilities they are asking; but they are asking a service on a road which stands upon an exact and equal footing with every other atom of railway mail service in the country. They are entitled to it, and according to the report of the Postmaster-General it is already provided for in the $81,000 allowed in that appropriate item to which it belongs in excess of the estimates.

Now, sir, we gave $350,000 for this item last year and this year we give $400,000 in this bill and the proposition of this amendment is to increase that to $450,000. I ask this committee to tell me why it shall be done when the report of the Post-Office Department shows that the $350,000 you gave last year is unexpended. It is a discretionary fund and they can make arbitrary allowances sufficiently large to carry it to $3,500,000 as easily as $350,000. There is no limit to it. It is absolutely in the discretion of the Department and we must stand upon the record that if $350,000 was enough for the present year $400,000 is enough to meet the service and its increase with all of its necessities for the present one, and the gentleman will fail to accomplish his purpose to protect the service upon a certain road by increasing these special facilities in this bill not a dollar of which can be diverted to such a purpose.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas has been recognized.

Mr. SLEMONS. I move to strike out the last word. I regret very much, Mr. Chairman, to find that the gentleman from Kentucky in charge of this bill seems to have lost confidence in the House, and has become alarmed about his bill——

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am not at all scared, I will state to the gentleman from Arkansas, by the attitude of this House toward the bill.

Mr. SLEMONS. I say that I am very much afraid the gentleman has become alarmed and appeals to the House to protect him. Now, we are willing to ask in the House or out of it what we want. We ask for what we want, and are not only willing to ask for it, but we demand it and insist upon our right to have it. The gentleman from Kentucky must remember that last year, before the appropriation bill passed, the Second Assistant Postmaster-General did recommend that $50,000 should be appropriated for this purpose, and the committee failed to make an appropriation for it; but by an agreement between the Post-Office Department and this road service was put on. This has not been paid for. Now, this Committee on Appropriations comes in, after the Second Assistant Postmaster-General has estimated that it will require $450,000 to cover the cost of this service and to pay for precisely what he asked the means to pay for last year, and for service that has already been put on to furnish the needed facilities to these people on the line of that road, and cuts it down to $400,000. A portion of this amount is to pay special compensation for mail service upon this very road. This road is running on the same terms as the other roads, according to the statement of the gentleman from Kentucky. In this I think the gentleman is mistaken. There was only one train a day on that road.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The gentleman has misunderstood my statement. I stated that this road stood on the same footing, as far as its rights and equities are concerned, as the other roads.

Mr. SLEMONS. Very well, we ask no more than that; we ask that the mail facilities of this road shall be continued. Now, the road was running only one train a day, and mail facilities or increased mail facilities upon it were demanded and were put on by the Department, and yet this committee come in here and propose to strike out from the estimates of the Department $50,000, which amount is contemplated to expend for payment of special facilities obtained upon this road, which is the longest line in the country.

The gentleman also claims that the Post-Office Department receives eight hundred thousand dollars and over from the Pacific roads. In this he is also mistaken. The Department only gets 10 per cent. of that. In other words, 10 per cent. goes to the Post-Office Department. The balance of it goes into the Treasury as the gentleman knows very well, and can no more be touched by the Post-Office Department than it can by himself, and only this 10 per cent. of that amount goes into the estimates of the Department, and not the entire amount as claimed by the gentleman.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Will the gentleman from Arkansas allow me to correct him?

Mr. SLEMONS. If I have misstated the gentleman.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I stated that upon the authority of the officials connected with the Post-Office Department, and upon a statement given by the Department and in evidence before the Committee on Appropriations that there is not a single dollar of that money that did not go into the service of the Post-Office Department.

Mr. SLEMONS. Very well; if the gentleman knows better than the Department of course his statement will have weight. I only know what the Post-Office Department reports. They only got 10 per cent. of this money, and the whole amount of it was never taken into consideration in making their estimates.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I know the amount of the fund that was turned into that Department from this source. I know that they did get an aggregate of $881,000 from the Pacific railroads.

Mr. SLEMONS. I am convinced that the gentleman is mistaken. I hold in my hand a statement not three days old which will satisfy him.

Mr. BLACKBURN. And I state most emphatically to the gentleman that the Department does get, or has received, and has charge of every dollar of that money.

Mr. SLEMONS. Does the gentleman mean to say that the Department receives the whole amount of that money, $881,000, derived from Pacific roads?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I say that the Department has received every dollar of it.

Mr. SLEMONS. More than 10 per cent. of it?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Yes; 10 per cent. has nothing whatever to do with it.

Mr. SLEMONS. I think the gentleman is certainly mistaken.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The gentleman himself is mistaken, and I will show him just where the mistake is. The law to which he refers is the Thurman bill of 1879, and since the time that that bill was passed up to this present time the amount aggregates $881,000, which has been absolutely credited to the Post-Office Department.

Mr. SLEMONS. Now, I say again, the gentleman gives no reason why this item should be stricken out of the bill. I understand from the Second Assistant Postmaster-General that it is put in for the special payment to this Iron Mountain and Saint Louis Railroad for additional services placed upon the road last year; and I want to assure the gentleman from Kentucky and other gentlemen who have spoken upon this matter that for myself I ask nothing whatever in this matter but what I believe to be right. We only ask what is right, and we hope that it will be granted in this case. The service has been put on, our people need it, and it should be continued.

I wish to have read in this connection a letter from the Second Assistant Postmaster-General to Senator GARLAND, which I will have read as a part of my remarks.

The Clerk read as follows:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL, RAILWAY ADJUSTMENT DIVISION,
Washington, D. C., January 24, 1881.

SIR: In compliance with your verbal request of this date I have the honor to state that in the matter of the public demand for a second daily mail on the Saint Louis, Iron Mountain and Southern Railroad, between Saint Louis and Texarkana, that at the last session of Congress it will be seen, by reference to the files, the Department transmitted to yourself and the Committees on Appropriations of the Senate and House statements showing the necessity for two daily mail services on this line, with an offer from the company to afford the desired accommodation for a special allowance at the rate of $50,000 per annum. No appropriation was then made for the service, but the company started a second daily train with mails on the 7th of November, 1880, for which they demanded special compensation at the rate of $75,000 per annum, to which, however, this office did not consent, but agreed to make such compensation for the service as might be provided by Congress.

The subject is presented for the consideration of the present session of Congress on pages 83 and 289 of the annual report.

I would repeat that without a second daily mail on the Saint Louis, Iron Mountain and Southern Railroad the people of Arkansas and Southeastern Missouri would not have mail facilities in keeping with their business interests, nor such as their development demands.

Very respectfully,

THOS. J. BRADY,
Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

Hon. A. H. GARLAND,
United States Senate.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, rose.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas made that motion, and spoke in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri. Under the rule the Chair of course desires to give preference to gentlemen who would speak in opposition to that amendment.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I desire to speak in opposition to it. I desire to state briefly this: it seems to me that the people of this section of the country are in the same position as to mail facilities as the people of every other section of the country. That if this amendment should obtain, it is indirectly a subsidy to a railroad company which it is claimed is not running trains enough. Now, if the business of that part of the country demands two trains a day, the Iron Mountain Railway will put on two trains, and then, under the general law as it now exists, arrangements can be made with the Post-Office Department whenever the mail service of the country demands it.

But, Mr. Chairman, it is rather an anomalous case when the fact is that the business interests of that country only demand one train a day, and yet the mail interests demand there shall be two mails a day. It seems to me that is something new in this country. We have always supposed that the increase of business preceded mail facilities, instead of mail facilities preceding the business interests. In our country, in the Northwest, I find we can only get two mails a day when the business interests are such that the railroad companies are obliged to run two postal trains a day, and we never have thought of demanding that the Government shall make an appropriation by which an extra train shall be run each day for the purpose of transporting the mail.

Mr. DUNN. May I ask the gentleman from Wisconsin a question?

Mr. HUMPHREY. Yes, sir.

Mr. DUNN. Is it not customary for the Government to put on overland stages on star routes at a great cost where very little business is being done?

Mr. HUMPHREY. Certainly; but the Government do not in that case give the people more than one mail a day. They seldom get more than one a week.

Now, people are not living entirely out of the world who get a mail once a day. The business interests of the country are such that there are few, if they get one mail a day, but are satisfied. And, Mr. Chairman, if the business interests of that country are such that the Iron Mountain Railway will put on two trains a day, no doubt they will get the mails. But this seems an attempt to subsidize that railroad and give them this sum for running an extra train.

Mr. DUNN. If the gentleman from Wisconsin will permit me, I will state that that road has put on two trains a day, and are now asking pay for carrying the mails on them.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I understood at the outset there was but one train a day on that railroad.

Mr. DUNN. If the gentleman had listened to the reading of that letter he would have learned there were two.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I listened to the reading of the letter, and understood it to purport simply this: that unless this special case was provided for by this appropriation this service could not be put on. Now, that I cannot accede to. I believe that the Post-Office Department has a discretion that when a section of country needs a service it can be furnished, and where two trains a day are running the Department, under its discretion, can put on a second mail without any special legislation.

Mr. MONEY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pending amendment is exhausted.

The question being taken on the formal amendment, it was not agreed to.

Mr. MONEY. I move to amend the amendment by inserting "$45,000," so that the amount will be $445,000, instead of $400,000 as in the bill.

This whole case can be briefly stated thus: there is no complaint that the mail service is not provided for on this railroad under the section of the bill beginning at line 56. Whether the sum voted by the committee will be sufficient for the service on all the railroads of the United States is a matter yet to be determined. It is the opinion of the Department it will not be sufficient. But as the law provides exactly what shall be paid by weight and space to these several railroads, it is a matter of indifference, I presume, with the Department, because the deficiency must be made good next session if the sum now appropriated does not prove sufficient.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The gentleman from Mississippi, I am assured, understands that the question of weight does not enter into this question.

Mr. MONEY. I know that. The question is whether this particular railroad shall be supplied with extra mail facilities, and the amendment comes in properly under this section. Now, this railroad runs two trains a day. My friend from Wisconsin [Mr. HUMPHREY] was mistaken on that point. But it has not two mails a day. The railroad on which I live, the Mississippi Central, has also two trains a day each way, but not two mails. It has only one mail, and we can get but one.

These special mail facilities are for the purpose of giving to the country in all sections a fast mail, which is promoting the efficiency of the postal service and making it a blessing to the business interests of the whole country. The sections which the gentleman from Arkansas and the gentleman from Missouri represent are as much entitled, perhaps, to extra facilities as any other section of the country. The Department can get along with $400,000 to carry out the arrangements they have already perfected with the railroads of the country for these special mail facilities; but they cannot put on the extra facilities on this particular road with that sum. To have those extra facilities to which the people of that section of the country are as much entitled as those of any other section of the country there must be appropriated this additional sum of money. That is the whole statement. It rests with the Committee of the Whole whether it will extend these extra facilities now enjoyed by New England and the West to another section of country for which this additional appropriation is asked.

This is the only grand trunk-line that I am acquainted with that is deprived of these extra mail facilities. It rests with the Committee of the Whole whether we will make a discrimination against that section of country or not. We are told by the Department that $400,000 is ample to carry on the arrangements already made, but the arrangements perfected by the Department did not embrace this particular railroad running through that particular section of the country. So far as I am concerned, I am willing to give these gentlemen and their section of the country what is enjoyed by my section and every other section of the country. That is the whole thing in a nutshell.

had not yet been expended, I will remind him the fiscal year has not yet expired. And I venture to say there will not be one dollar of that money left when the year has expired, for I know that the arrangements already made with the several companies will absorb every cent of the $350,000 which we have appropriated. If there is anything over, then arrangements would have been made with this trunk railroad.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I want to call the attention of the Committee of the Whole to the law governing this service, because if this amendment shall be adopted for the reason assigned by the gentleman from Arkansas, [Mr. DUNN,] we will take a new departure. The law provides—and I now read from section 4002 of the Revised Statutes:

That the mails shall be conveyed with due frequency and speed; and that sufficient and suitable room, fixtures, and furniture, in a car or apartment properly lighted and warmed, shall be provided for route agents to accompany and distribute the mails.

Under the law the Post-Office Department has the right, first, to compel the railroad company to carry the mails "with due frequency and speed;" and, second, to furnish the cars to carry the route agents for the distribution of the mails. It may be said, perhaps, by gentlemen that it is a right without power to enforce it. But we provide in this very bill that if the railroad companies fail to furnish the necessary facilities their compensation shall be reduced 10 per cent. from what it is under the law as it now stands.

Mr. MONEY. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. If I have the time; I have only five minutes.

Mr. MONEY. It is for the information of my friend and of the House. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the Government can compel a railroad to take the mails upon its fast trains?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I am coming to the fast trains.

Mr. MONEY. Cannot the railroad carry the mails upon any of its passenger trains?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I am coming to the fast trains in a minute. In my opinion, the Government has the power now under the law to compel a railroad company to take the mail upon any of its trains.

Mr. MONEY. Let me say to the gentleman that the thing was tested on the New York Central Railroad, and Vanderbilt put the mail upon his accommodation train, which did not make fifteen miles an hour, and the Government had no power to compel him to put it on the fast trains.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I hope this will not come out of my time. The gentleman asked me for my opinion and I gave it to him. Let that be as it may, Congress has seen fit to appropriate $350,000 for extra speed and special facilities, owing to the decrease of compensation. Now, is that what is asked for by the gentleman from Arkansas, [Mr. DUNN?] Not at all. It is not for extra speed; it is not for increased facilities; it is for an additional mail train.

Now, an additional mail train can be had under the existing law; and if the railroad company refuses to furnish these facilities it will be liable to at least 10 per cent. reduction. Hence the Department has singled out this one railroad, both in the annual report and in the letter which has been read from the Clerk's desk, because it does not come within either of the classes of railroads for which we have been making appropriations.

Now, if you pass this appropriation for the reason assigned by gentlemen, then you will place it in the power of any and of all the railroads of this country to say, under this precedent, that they will run but one train a day upon which the mails are carried, unless the Department complies with their terms at an expense of $75,000 or $100,000 or $500,000, as the case may be, for more than daily service.

The law is ample and sufficient now to compel the carrying of the mails as frequently as is demanded by the necessities of the public. I call for an enforcement of the law as it now exists instead of giving this kind of relief.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] to the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. CLARDY.]

Mr. MONEY. I will withdraw my amendment.

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. CLARDY, and upon a division there were—ayes 30, noes 53.

No further vote being called for, the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

For inland transportation by steamboat routes, $900,000.

Mr. UPSON. I move to amend the paragraph just read by striking out "$900,000" and inserting "$1,000,000." I move that amendment for the reason that in my own State a considerable additional amount of steamboat mail service is needed, and I understand the same is true of the State of North Carolina and also of the State of Louisiana.

In my own State about two hundred miles of new steamboat mail service is needed, and I understand that about three hundred miles of such service is needed in North Carolina; how much is needed in Louisiana I do not know. I am informed by the Post-Office Department that unless the amount estimated for, $1,000,000, is appropriated we cannot have the benefit of that service.

So far as the service asked for in my own district is concerned it is absolutely necessary. It is for places situated upon inland bays, where sail-boat mail service has been tried and where land service has been tried, and both have been found insufficient to give the public the mail facilities which they absolutely need, and the steamboat mail service is required for the purpose. Unless this amount is given by Congress, I am informed by the Post-Office Department that the service which is absolutely necessary cannot be granted.

I do not know what the information of the Committee on Appropriations is, but such is my information from the Department. Upon making application to the Department for this service we have been answered that it cannot be granted unless the amount estimated for by the Department is appropriated by Congress.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am very sure that I do not go beyond the fact when I say that the Committee on Appropriations has no purpose or view of crippling the steamboat postal service at all, nor of failing to give the full amount that it is possible can be properly used both to maintain that service at its present rate and to meet its natural increase.

Now, if gentlemen will turn to the report of the Postmaster-General, and look at the tables on page 556, they will find that the expenditure for transportation of mails by steam for the year 1880 was only $794,149.15.

We appropriated last year $900,000 for this service, the Department asking $1,000,000. But the whole of the $900,000 that we appropriated has not been expended. The report which I hold in my hand states that there is a gradual increase of estimate and appropriation for railway transportation because in many instances it is being substituted for steamboat service. If there is thus an increase of appropriation for railway trasportation by reason of its substitution for steamboat service, then there should of necessity be a decrease pro tanto of the cost of steamboat service. But the $900,000 that we appropriated last year has proved amply sufficient; and $900,000 is the amount proposed to be appropriated by this bill. It is more than has ever yet been expended for this service in any one year, and there is nothing in the report of the Postmaster-General on this subject that looks to an increase except what I am about to read, on page 79. The Postmaster-General devotes seven lines to the subject of steamboat mail service. He says:

The cost of steamboat service for 1880 was $887,221. The appropriation for the current year is $900,000, which is $100,000 less than the amount estimated to be necessary.

I grant that the estimate then was $1,000,000, as it is $1,000,000 now. He continues:

The demand and necessity for steamboat service call for an increased appropriation for this item for the year 1882, and the estimate is therefore placed at $1,000,000, which is a little more than 11.11 per cent. over the amount provided for the current year, being the same amount as was estimated to be necessary for the current fiscal year.

There is not the difference of a cent between his estimate for this year and for next year. He shows by his own report that he had a surplus of more than $100,000; $105,000 more was appropriated than was expended. Yet he now asks for $100,000 more, to be piled on top of that. If the committee had thought that the steamboat service would cost $1,000,000, that sum would have been appropriated in this bill without a word; but the expenditure for steamboat service has never reached $900,000 a year. Hence the committee are forced to conclude that $900,000 will be amply sufficient to meet the demands of this service for the coming year. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted.

Mr. UPSON. I would like to be heard in reply to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACKBURN,] who has made some statements which seem to be in conflict with the report of the Postmaster-General.

The CHAIRMAN. The rule is very explicit.

Mr. UPSON. I move pro forma to amend the amendment by striking out the last word. I wish to call the attention of the committee to the report of the Postmaster-General, page 79. If I understood the gentleman from Kentucky correctly, he stated that the expenditure for this service during the last year was $794,000.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The gentleman has made a mistake which he will recognize in a moment. On page 79 of his report, the Postmaster-General states, not what has been paid out for this service, but what the cost of it was. Turning to page 556 of the same report we find a table giving the figures which I have given to the committee.

Mr. UPSON. Let me get through. I wish to read the statement of the Postmaster-General:

The cost of steamboat service for 1880 was $887,221. The appropriation for the current year is $900,000, which is $100,000 less than the amount estimated to be necessary. The demand and necessity for steamboat service call for an increased appropriation for this item for the year 1882, and the estimate is therefore placed at $1,000,000, which is a little more than 11.11 per cent. over the amount provided for the current year, being the same amount as was estimated to be necessary for the current fiscal year.

I will state for the information of the committee that since the estimate was made there have been given to the State of North Carolina over one hundred miles of new steamboat service, and that State still requires over two hundred miles more. This, of course, does not enter into the calculation of the expenditure of last year. I am informed that in addition to the three hundred miles of steamboat transportation demanded in the State of North Carolina, at least two hundred miles more are required in the State of Texas, and a considerable increase in the State of Louisiana. I will grant that there was a surplus last year of $105,000, as is stated by the gentleman from Kentucky; still, for the coming year, the additional $100,000 proposed in the amendment will be needed, according to the statement of the Post-Office Department; otherwise certain States of the Union will be deprived of service absolutely needed for the public interest.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Is he not aware that the statement which he has read, showing the cost of this service at $887,000, is a statement of the rate of cost on the 30th day of last June, without any reference to fines or deductions, and that the only reliable statement of the cost of the service is the money actually paid out, which amounted to $794,000?

Mr. UPSON. I have said that I was willing to admit that the statement of the gentleman from Kentucky was correct, that there was a surplus, yet the additional $100,000 covered by my amendment will be required in order to secure the new service which is wanted.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I only desired to correct the gentleman from Texas for his own benefit by showing that the apparent discrepancy between the cost of this service, as stated on page 79, and the expenditure as given in the table on page 556 is attributable to the fact that fines and penalties are as much available for the purposes of the Department as money directly appropriated by Congress, and the difference results from the deduction of these in the table on page 556, which shows the money actually paid out, it thus appearing that of the $900,000 appropriated the actual expenditure was only $794,149.15.

Mr. UPSON. I grant that the gentleman's statement is entirely correct; yet I insist that the whole amount of the estimate is necessary to be now appropriated in order to give the service required. When I have asked for the steamboat mail service in my own district, which is much needed, I have been met with the assurance by the Post-Office Department that it would be granted if Congress would appropriate money enough, and that the estimate made was deemed necessary in order to prepare the new service required. I therefore hope the amount estimated will be appropriated.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. KING. I wish to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. BLOUNT. I will yield presently to the gentleman for that purpose.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is a great tendency to extravagance and looseness of appropriation in this matter of steamboat mail service. Taking the history of that service before the war, we find that as railroads were being built throughout the country, and following the lines of our great navigable streams, from year to year the Postmaster-General took off what is technically termed steamboat service and supplied its place with railway mail service. For the past two or three years this House, however, through inadvertence, simply upon the mere statement of a member who wanted the service here or there that, on application, the Second Assistant Postmaster-General said he had not the money to put on the service asked for, has gone on and reversed the whole previous policy of Congress in this regard.

I have before me, Mr. Chairman, the history of that service, beginning in 1870 and coming down to 1877, as it is presented in the report of the Post-Office Department. The highest rate paid for this steamboat service during all those years was in 1870, when it amounted to $20,695. Pursuing the course indicated by the judgment of the Postmaster-General, it continued to decrease year after year until it reached in 1877 $17,685. The railway mail service had gradually, as railroads were built throughout the country, supplied the place of this steamboat service, but, as I have said, unwillingly for the last two or three years; and merely upon the simple suggestion by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General to a member who wanted additional steamboat service that he had not the money for the purpose, this House has been blindly pushing forward that steamboat service until to-day we have reached a higher appropriation for it than at any time since the war. We are now, by appropriating $23,329, reversing the old policy and going backward. The building of railroads to take the place of this service does not seem to reduce appropriation, and applications continue to be made to the Government to put on further steamboat service, and the result is as I have stated. Along all our rivers are railroads already carrying the mails, and the Government has been congratulated on the fact of this new and better service. Yet, sir, for two or three years this House has seen fit to ignore all this and put steamboat service where it is possible to do it.

My friend says that we need this service in South Carolina. He says further that we need it in Louisiana and in various other places. Has the gentleman given this House or can he give the House a thorough statement of the condition of the railway mail service in that section? It has an immense star-route service, which has almost doubled within the last few years. That being so, we are not to be guided, and I trust we will not be guided, by these impromptu and ill-considered statements as to appropriations on a bill carrying forty-odd millions of dollars. There is something to be learned from the natural growth of the service. It is its history from which we can adduce its wants, and I undertake to say that no gentleman in this House or in the Post-Office Department, from the highest official to the lowest, can reach any satisfactory conclusion as to the wants of the service in any given branch of it unless by a study of that service.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. BLOUNT. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I wish to know whether the steamboat service throughout the country at large has been increased.

Mr. BLOUNT. I have so stated, and given figures showing the increase.

Mr. KING. From the statement of the gentleman from Kentucky we are led to infer it had decreased. Now, I know the statement of the gentleman in reference to the State of Louisiana is perfectly correct.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not remember the statement of the gentleman from Kentucky, but I speak from the official data found in the reports of the Post-Office Department itself. Every statement I have made comes with the sanction of the Postmaster-General.

Mr. KING. I know the demand, the natural and legitimate demand, for increase of steamboat service in the State of Louisiana is felt by citizens residing on the banks of those rivers.

Mr. BLOUNT. So far as that is concerned, if the service were properly adjusted the gentleman might have the service he wants. There is undoubtedly service on many of our rivers which ought to be abandoned; but the administration of that Department, putting service here and there, star routes and steamboat service, shows, if we are to learn anything from the past, the actions of the officers of that Department are not based on the judgment of the Department itself in reference to the particular service asked for, but granted in accordance with the individual judgment of members.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the formal amendments will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The question recurred on Mr. UPSON'S amendment.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 21, noes 64.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. UPSON. I give notice I shall demand a yea-and-nay vote on that amendment in the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment being rejected, there will be no opportunity for a vote on it in the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

For inland transportation by steamboat routes, $7,875,000.

Mr. HASKELL. I move to strike out "$7,875,000," and in lieu thereof to insert "$8,260,000."

Now, Mr. Chairman, the post-route bill of the last session of Congress contained provision for 1,300 new star routes. The bill that will be reported at this session of Congress will contain about seven hundred additional routes. That will make in all about two thousand new star routes which will be legalized and ready for service on the 1st day of July next. The amendment sent to the Clerk's desk is the estimate of the Department. I have very little to say in urging this amendment, as it is generally understood by the members of the House. In my judgment the full amount of the estimate ought to be appropriated. The committee seem to be of the other opinion. In offering the amendment I simply wanted to afford the House an opportunity of increasing it up to the estimates of the Department if they saw fit. I believe it will be needed.

It is useless for me to enter upon a long dissertation concerning the importance to the people of this country of the star-route service.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I ask that the amendment be again reported.

The Clerk read the amendment.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this amendment for the reason I am satisfied the amount recommended by the Committee on Appropriations is ample for the star service.

In my opinion, the estimate of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General for star service is not reliable, and for that matter, was not last year. For the last fiscal year we appropriated for this service $6,000,000 and the Second Assistant made a deficiency estimate for $2,000,000, amounting in all to $8,000,000; of this deficiency we appropriated $1,100,000, making the total appropriation for star service last year $7,100,000.

Now, when I consult the Sixth Auditor's report I find that the actual payments for star service last year were $6,925,274.98, which is $174,725.02 less than the appropriation, and this, too, after we had refused to appropriate $900,000 of the amount estimated for by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General; and from the best information I can get, I am satisfied there will be at least $100,000 of this appropriation covered back into the Treasury. So that the figures show that this service last year cost less than $7,000,000.

Now for the current year the appropriation for the star service is $7,375,000; that is to say, $375,000 more than the service in fact cost last year. The Second Assistant Postmaster-General, in making up his estimates for the coming year for this service, fixes the amount at $8,260,000, an increase over the cost of last year of $1,200,000; and over the appropriation of the current year of $825,000. The Committee on Appropriations recommend for this service the coming year $7,875,000, an increase over the current year of $500,000, an amount, in my opinion, ample to more than cover the cost of all necessary service, including a large amount of new service. The Committee on Appropriations knew the anxiety of the House to be liberal with this service, and went, in their recommendation, beyond what they believed necessary to furnish every needed facility.

And I will say here, Mr. Chairman, that to my mind the Second Assistant Postmaster-General is not fair and candid to Congress or the country in his statements in connection with the estimates for the star service, as well in what he states as in what he omits. For instance, on page 76 of the Postmaster-General's report, he says:

The improvements in the star service during the last year are fully shown in the statistical tables accompanying this report, but I will add that, in pursuance of the liberal policy of your predecessor, this service is now (having gone into operation the 1st of July last) practically double what it was on the 30th June last in the States of Indiana, Ohio, Kentucky, Tennessee, Alabama, Mississippi, Georgia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Florida. It is not yet what it ought to be throughout these great States, and in many others, or what it will be under a continued wise administration and generous legislation.

Now this statement, taken in connection with what precedes and follows it, leads one to suppose that the doubling of service in the States mentioned largely increased the cost of the service, and is apparently thrown in as a make-weight in favor of a large increase of appropriation. In answer to inquiry a few days ago I received a tabulated statement at the Department showing that, notwithstanding the doubling of the service in the States mentioned, the cost of same under the new letting, commencing 1st of July last, was less than it was for one-half the same service prior to that time; which tabulated statement is as follows:

Cost of star service June 30, 1879, as compared with amount under the letting of service to commence July 1, 1880.

| States. | Cost June 30, 1879. | Cost July 1, 1880. | Increase. | Decrease. | Per cent. increase. | Per cent. decrease. |

Mr. BLACKBURN. I move to strike out the last word of the amendment, and yield my time to the gentleman from Illinois.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will rise to receive a message from the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. HUNTON having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 2038) making appropriations for completing the compilation and publishing the returns of the tenth census; also, Senate resolution No. 146, a joint resolution to provide for the printing and distribution of the index of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD semi-monthly; also, a Senate concurrent resolution providing for the printing of 15,560 copies of the report of the Smithsonian Institution for the year 1880; in which bill and resolutions concurrence was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the resolution of the House providing for the printing of 2,500 extra copies of the report of the health office of the District of Columbia.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Again, the Second Assistant Postmaster-General informs us on page 79, in further speaking of the estimates for the star service, that there is to be a new letting in New York and other States, as follows:

Then the regular advertisement has been issued inviting proposals for carrying the mails on all star routes in New England, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, and West Virginia for the new contract term of four years commencing July 1, 1881. The intention is to give to such of these States as may need them facilities superior to those now in operation. The bids for the new service cannot reasonably be expected to be as low as those made in 1876, upon which the present service is being performed.

In view of the fact to which I have just called the attention of the committee, that as much again service in the States south and one west costs less than it did under the former contract prior to 1st July last, I apprehend we are justified in believing that the service to be let on the 1st of July next will also cost less. The truth is, there has been a great revival of business, but that very fact legitimately tends to decrease the expense of carrying the mails on the star routes in the older sections of the country, because wherever these star routes do a passenger business or an express business or a freight business, there it is very important to the contractors to add to their profits by the carrying of the mails; and the competition, therefore, arising from this increase of business is liable to cheapen the mail service instead of increasing its cost. That no doubt explains the fact that in the new contracts commencing 1st of July last the new service, double in amount what it was last year, is cheaper than it was last year under contract made four years ago.

I again say, therefore, that it was the desire of the Committee on Appropriations not only to be liberal, but to be more than liberal; to recommend to the House an appropriation of money to take care of this service North and South and East and West, and more than enough. And when we recommend an increase of half a million dollars over and above the amount for the current year, with these facts staring us in the face, we felt we did recommend more than enough.

Now, Mr. Chairman, a word in conclusion. Under a wise administration of the Post-Office Department, in my opinion the cash of the star service will from this time forward decrease. There are in round numbers 10,000 star-routes upon which this service is being performed. Last year on one hundred and seven of these routes, in Texas, Colorado, California, and the Territories, the cash of service was in round numbers at the rate of $3,200,000 per annum, nearly as much as upon the 9,900 other routes. The completion of the Southern Pacific Railroad, and the near completion of the Northern Pacific Railroad, as well as the rapid construction of railroads elsewhere in the western part of the country, is making and will continue to make unnecessary year by year the great expensive star routes, and I trust that a vigilant and wise administration of the Department, upon the one hand, in spending these appropriations, and a vigilant inquiry by Congress in making these appropriations, upon the other, will give the country not only a good and sufficient, but also an economical service. The amendment of the gentleman from Kansas, in my opinion, should not prevail.

Mr. HASKELL. I have been informed, also, by the Post-Office Department of the facts stated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] concerning the cost of the old service; and it has gratified me very much to know that the mail contracts at the present time are being let cheaper than they were some years since. But that refers to the old service. That refers to the routes already established. For the 2,000 new routes not yet let formally—service having been put on them temporarily until they could be let—for the 2,000 new routes provided for by Congress there is only $275,000 set apart by this bill. I simply doubt the judgment of the committee as to that amount. I do not believe it will be enough.

That is my judgment, taking into consideration and assuming that what the gentleman from Illinois says concerning the Southern States will be true in the West, that the old service, although increased in number of trips, will not be increased materially in the cost of the service. The fact remains that we have this immense number of new routes, and from all the information I could gather $275,000 was not enough. Hence the amendment I made to increase it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I desire simply to make one statement. Last year we appropriated $5,900,000 for this star service. We passed a supplemental bill in the shape of a deficiency, appropriating $1,100,000 more; and in the same supplemental bill we appropriated a further amount of $100,000 for new service, making an aggregate of the original appropriation bill, with these deficiencies, of $7,375,000 given to this star service for the present fiscal year.

The bill now before the committee takes those items, deficiencies and all, includes them all, and adds $500,000 more to that to meet the increase of the star service. That is the proposition of the bill. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas proposes to supplement this bill by adding $385,000 more.

Now, sir, I beg the Committee of the Whole to see what it is that is asked to-day. It is asked to appropriate the amount deemed necessary in the appropriation bill a year ago plus $1,200,000 plus $500,000 more, and then to add $385,000 to this aggregated sum. I do not believe that the service demands it, and I trust the amendment will not be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. HASKELL,] which the Clerk will again report.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 86 strike out "$7,875,000" and insert "$8,260,00;" so that it will read: "For inland transportation by star routes, $8,260,000."

The question being taken on the amendment, it was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

For mail-bags and mail-bag catchers, $185,000.

Mr. MONEY. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lines 98 and 99 strike out "$185,000" and insert "$220,000;" so that it will read:

"For mail bags and mail-bag catchers, $220,000."

Mr. MONEY. I desire the Clerk to read what I have marked on pages 80 and 81 of the report of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

The Clerk read as follows:

The accompanying table, (G,) prepared for the appendix of the Postmaster-General's annual report, shows that the total number of new mail-bags of every description purchased and put into service during the year was 64,398, of which 10,963 were locked pouches and 53,435 were tie sacks, being, altogether, a decrease, compared with the preceding year, of 39,623 mail-bags; that the number of mail-catchers purchased, besides extra appurtenances thereto, was 300, and that the total expense of mail-bags and mail-catchers, including repairs, &c., was $146,601.76, being a decrease in expense of $23,664.50 compared with the preceding year.

The total number of mail-bags repaired during the year was 363,352, and the total cost of their repairs was $42,191.91; an increase in quantity of 6,825 and in cost of $4,578.81 compared with the preceding year.

With the current fiscal year the mail service has set in with largely increased demands for mail-bags, caused not only by the expansion of mail facilities, but also by the fact that thousands of old damaged mail-bags which were reclaimed and repaired from time to time for service during the last six years are at length rapidly giving out and falling into decay, and will require to be replaced with new bags during the present and ensuing fiscal years. It is apprehended from the increased expense, relatively, of the first quarter, just ended, that the amount appropriated ($185,000) for the current fiscal year, ending June 30, 1881, will be insufficient, without extreme and perhaps unwise economy, to supply the wants of the mail service during the year. The large reduction in the quantities of new mail-bags purchased during the year ended 30th of June last, compared with the preceding year, will, it is feared, claim compensation for it in the next year, and is another fact tending to strengthen the apprehension of future necessity for greater expense.

I conclude, therefore, that less than the amount here estimated would be greatly at the risk of seriously embarrassing the mail service, the demands of which are, from a multitude of incidents affecting them, variable, fluctuating, and impossible to be foreseen with exactness of amount, and yet such demands, in most cases, are of a nature too urgent to be refused or even deferred without imminent danger of interrupting or stopping the transmission of the mails.

Mr. MONEY. This amendment concerns an indispensable requirement of the mail service. Without proper mail-bags the service cannot be efficiently performed. For the last three years this sum of $185,000 is what has been appropriated for this purpose. The report of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General shows that this amount is insufficient. The cost of the repairs of mail-bags during the past year, it appears, has been over $42,000; and on account of the insufficiency of the appropriation bags in a dilapidated condition have been suffered to accumulate.

The number of new bags purchased last year was nearly forty thousand less than in the year before, although there has been a great increase in the business of the Department in the bulk and weight of mails to be transported. The reason was that the contract was about to expire for the furnishing of these bags to the Department, and it was deemed necessary to get a new design and some improvement in the construction.

For that reason there was not the usual amount of mail-bags purchased last year. The old sum of $185,000, which has been appropriated now annually for three years, without any reference to the increased business of the country, without any reference to the decay and destruction of pouches and bags, is continued for this year.

I cannot tell what the increased business of the whole United States is; but take the New York post-office, which is the great central post-office of the country, and the increased business for this year is already 16 per cent., and that rate of increase is sufficient to justify the appropriation of the full amount I have named in my amendment.

Gentlemen also will recollect that this has been a hard winter; there has been much delay and detention in the carrying of the mails, and they have accumulated at times to a great amount upon the various lines. When the winter is open, and there is no obstruction upon the railway lines, there is no difficulty in transporting the mails; but when the mails accumulate at any point by reason of obstruction of the great trunk-lines of the country, there is demanded a greater number of bags and pouches for their transportation.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Whatever else may be lacking, there never is any want of excuses to be urged by the Post-Office Department for the estimates they submit.

We are giving in this item of the bill the sum of $185,000; precisely the amount that was appropriated for 1879, for 1880, and for 1881. For three years past the Post-Office Department has had precisely the amount of money for this purpose which this bill proposes to appropriate, and there is no deficiency. From the report of the Post-Office Department I find that for last year there has been spent for this purpose only $166,530.51, although $185,000 was appropriated.

Now to go back to other years. I have said that for the last three years $185,000 each year was appropriated for this purpose. For 1878 there was appropriated $200,000; for 1877 $175,000, and for 1876 $210,000. Therefore it would seem that there has not been such an increase in expenditures under this item. For the year 1876 there was appropriated, as I have said, $210,000; for the year 1878 $200,000, and for the past three years there has not been annually appropriated more than $185,000. Yet I find that only $166,530.51 was paid out during the last fiscal year for this purpose.

The Committee on Appropriations does not feel that it would be warranted in making an appropriation in excess of any that has been made for the last three years for this purpose, in view of the fact that it has proven amply sufficient. This item of expenditures by the Post-Office Department shows a shrinkage instead of an increase from year to year. I trust, therefore, the amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. MONEY. I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of replying to the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACKBURN.] He makes the same statement of facts that I complained of, that for three or four years past the same appropriation has been made for a business which has increased this year 16 per cent.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MONEY. Certainly.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Then why is it that the Postmaster-General last year, with $185,000 in his hands for this purpose, let the service run so low as to spend only $166,000?

Mr. MONEY. If the gentleman had done me the honor to listen to what I said——

Mr. BLACKBURN. I did listen to the gentleman very carefully.

Mr. MONEY. I said that because the time of the contract for supplying these bags and pouches was about to expire, and the Department wanted to obtain a different class and better order of bags and an improved device for closing the bags, the expenditures were not to the extent they would otherwise have been.

The gentleman himself has furnished a sufficient reason why this appropriation should be increased as I have suggested. It is because the business of the country has increased. New York City alone sends out on an average every day five hundred letter-pouches and two thousand six hundred canvas sacks. Last year the increase of business was 14 per cent., and yet no increased appropriation is made for supplying mail-bags and mail-pouches. The gentleman himself has furnished the very reason why this appropriation should be raised to the amount I have indicated. It is because of the small amounts which have heretofore been appropriated, and, as I have already said, for that reason $40,000 less was expended for new bags last year than the year before.

Mr. BLACKBURN. It was the same appropriation as was made the year before.

Mr. MONEY. And for the same reason——

Mr. BLACKBURN. And for the year before that.

Mr. MONEY. We have had this increase of business since then. Last year the increase was 14 per cent., and this year the increase has been 16 per cent. over last year, and it is proposed now to appropriate only the same amount that was appropriated last year. We cannot transport the mails properly unless we have a sufficient number of bags and pouches in which to do it. Of course, if there is more money on hand, so much the better. I congratulate the Department that it has been able to save money out of the small appropriations allowed by Congress. But taking into consideration the increased business of the country and the dilapidated condition of the bags and pouches heretofore used, I say this amount is absolutely necessary. I withdraw now my pro forma amendment, and hope that the amendment to the paragraph will be adopted.

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. MONEY to increase the appropriation for mail-bags and mail-bag catchers from $185,000 to $220,000, and it was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

For miscellaneous items, $1,000.

Mr. DUNN. I ask consent to go back to line 55 in order to offer an amendment.

Mr. BLOUNT. I must object.

Mr. DUNN. Then I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk, to come in after the paragraph relating to miscellaneous items just read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Postmaster-General shall, out of the appropriations hereinbefore made, make all proper and necessary arrangements to place a second daily mail and post-office service, with necessary equipment, from Saint Louis, Missouri, to Texarkana, Texas.

Mr. BLOUNT. I make the point of order that this amendment is not germane to the pending paragraph. We have passed the matter of railroad transportation.

Mr. DUNN. I hope the gentleman will not press that point.

Mr. BLOUNT. In addition, the amendment is new legislation not in the interest of economy.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the fact of an amendment not being germane to the paragraph is not sufficient to rule it out, if it be germane to the bill. But at the same time the Chair must hold that this amendment proposes new legislation which does not involve retrenchment of expenditures in any of the three methods provided by the rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of the Third Assistant Postmaster-General:

For manufacture of adhesive postage-stamps, of official stamps, and of newspaper and periodical stamps, $105,000: Provided, That the condition attached to the item of appropriation for the "manufacture of adhesive postage-stamps," &c., in the first section of the "act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1879, which condition is in the following words, namely, "If said stamps can be furnished by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing of the Treasury Department at less than the same now cost, the work of printing the same shall be given to said bureau when not in violation of existing contracts," be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. HUNTON. I move to strike out the proviso of this paragraph beginning in line 104 and terminating at the end of the paragraph. My purpose in moving this amendment is to obtain an understanding of what is designed by the proviso. According to its language, it would appear that the effect will be to exclude the Bureau of Engraving and Printing of the Treasury Department from obtaining this work, even though it should be the lowest bidder. It does seem to me that if the Government can do this work more cheaply than it can have it done, the work ought to be done by the Government. If the Bureau of Engraving and Printing can do the work at less than would be paid for it if done elsewhere, then I think that bureau ought to have the opportunity to bid for it. But I make the motion merely for the purpose of obtaining an explanation of the proviso.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] let me say that the condition attached to a former Post-Office appropriation bill, which this proviso seeks to repeal, was never (as shown by the Journal and the RECORD) passed as law at all; it never had the sanction of either House of Congress. When that appropriation bill went to the enrolling clerks for enrollment, the proviso or condition which we here seek to repeal was not in it. While it stands in the statutes, it was never agreed to by either House of Congress. I will say further, that it never ought to have been agreed to by either House, for it had not the effect of permitting the Bureau of Engraving and Printing to come in as an equal bidder for the making of these adhesive stamps; but its effect was to exclude all other competitive bidders, and simply require the Bureau of Engraving and Printing to bid against existing rates. Now, I take it that the gentleman from Virginia does not want to sanction such a thing as that. I take it that no gentleman wants to give an exclusive privilege like that to the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. It already has advantages enough. If it comes in as a bidder upon the same terms with the competitive bidders of the country, it still has advantages over each and all of them. It has its rent all free; it has its gas and its fuel free. The Government furnishes all these, which other bidders must supply for themselves. These are advantages enough to be enjoyed in this matter by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. The Committee on Appropriations, by inserting this proviso, mean simply to repeal a condition in a former bill which permitted the Bureau of Engraving and Printing to be the only bidder, provided it would undertake to do the work at less than ten cents per thousand, which in round numbers is the present rate. That, I hold, nobody wants to sanction.

More than that; if I had the power I would not permit the Bureau of Engraving and Printing to compete at all for this work. Even if it should be the lowest bidder, who is to be responsible for the deficit if the bureau should bid too low to make the work remunerative? The Government of the United States is responsible; this bureau cannot lose a dollar. It might undertake to do the work at five cents a thousand and lose three cents on every thousand; yet the Government itself would be the loser. There is no responsible party to insure that the work shall be done at the bid of this bureau without loss to the Government.

I repeat: all that this proviso does is to repeal a condition in the former bill, which condition never was agreed to by either House of Congress. It crept in by mistake; and it has worked so inequitably and unfairly as to shut out all competitive bidding throughout the country, and give the contract to the Bureau of Engraving and Printing provided it would bid lower than existing rates. I hope that the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia will not be adopted, and that the proviso in the bill will remain.

Mr. HUNTON. I know nothing as to the manner in which this original provision was adopted. It is the law of the land, and this proviso seeks to repeal it. But I desire to put to my friend from Kentucky this question: If the proviso in this paragraph should be retained, can the Bureau of Engraving and Printing be a competitor for the printing of these adhesive stamps?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will say to the gentleman from Virginia that my construction of the law would be——

Mr. HUNTON. Will the gentleman answer my question?

Mr. BLACKBURN. What is it that the gentleman wants? Does he want me to give some other man's opinion. I think that the Bureau of Engraving and Printing would, under the operation of this proviso, stand exactly upon an equality with other competitive bidders of the country, save and except that the Government furnishes to this bureau its rent, its fuel, and its light all free.

Mr. HUNTON. If this proviso be retained, can the bureau come in as a competitor for this work?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I should say that it could, but I hope it would not.

Mr. HUNTON. I hope it would; and, believing that it would, I withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of agent and assistants to distribute postal cards, and expenses of agency, $7,300.

Mr. KING. I move to amend by inserting after the word "cards," in line 125, and before the word "two"——

Mr. BLACKBURN. I make the point that comes too late, as we have passed that paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk had read down to line 130, passing that clause and one or two clauses after it. The gentleman from Kentucky objects to going back, and the Clerk will therefore proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of Superintendent of Foreign Mails:
For transportation of foreign mails $225,000.

Mr. DAVIS, of California. In line 140, after the word "dollars," I move to insert the following:

Provided, That the Postmaster-General is authorized to pay to the colonies of New Zealand and New South Wales, so much of the cost of the overland transportation of the British closed mails to and from Australia as he may deem just, not to exceed one-half of said cost, and the sum of $40,000 is hereby appropriated for that purpose.

Mr. Chairman, this proviso is substantially the same as the proviso which was attached June last to the Post-Office appropriation bill. It is varied somewhat in its wording, at the suggestion of the Department, as that previous proviso was found in a measure to be inoperative.

Now, sir, I would say one word to this committee in reference to the circumstances which authorize the offering of this proviso. The mails from Australia to England have the choice of two routes, one by the Red Sea and the other by the way of San Francisco and New York. This latter route is maintained solely by the colonies of New South Wales and New Zealand. The mails are carried in American ships and those ships are maintained by those colonies alone at an expense of $240,000 per annum. They carry our mails almost without charge—at no charge except sea postage. The existence of this line has brought these colonies into close relation with our people. It has built up business, it has maintained friendly relations, it has brought the two peoples closely to one another, so that last year the business had increased to such dimensions and was so much in our favor that the exports of American produce to Australia amounted to $8,000,000, while their imports reached only $1,000,000.

Now, it would seem to be the policy of our Government to encourage so favorable relation, but so far from that our Government, availing itself of a privilege granted to it by the postal convention of Paris, charges these colonies, in return for this trade and these advantages, double the rates proposed for world-wide territorial transportation under that treaty. We charge them twice as much for carrying their mails across our territory as is charged anywhere else on the face of the earth.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, as a matter of liberality, of generosity, of courtesy, of patriotism, it is no more than fair to remit these extra charges, and that is all this proviso intends to do—to remit and pay back to the colonies the extra charge we have made for the carrying of these mails across our country. I submit to the committee that this proviso should pass on either one of three grounds, namely, that the present course is impolitic, that it is unjust, that it is illiberal. It is impolitic inasmuch as it tends to destroy this communication between these two peoples who are thus trying to get nearer to one another. It is unjust, as they carry our mails from the South Pacific Ocean and make almost no charge whatever for so doing—indeed, nothing but the sea postage. It is impolitic as it drives away from us a valuable trade and severs a relation which the mother country of England has been trying by every means in her power to destroy, hoping to break up the trade which is rising and growing so rapidly between these colonies and the United States.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I desire to have the amendment again reported to see wherein it differs from the provision attached to the last Post-Office appropriation bill.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I now desire to have read the provision which is contained in the Post-Office appropriation law for the current fiscal year.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the Postmaster-General be authorized to remit in favor of the colonies of New Zealand and New South Wales so much of the cost of the overland transportation of the Australian closed mails as he may deem just.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Now, Mr. Chairman, if the committee will give me its attention for a few minutes I will state what I understand to be the facts touching this amendment, and then of course if it be the sense of this committee to adopt it I have nothing further to say.

Under the postal union treaty to which Great Britain, the home government, is a party, the transportation of the British closed mails from Great Britain to Australia pass through our territory upon a charge, which, by the way, is exceptional to the general rates under that treaty, owing to the long line of transportation by rail from New York to San Francisco. Now, this money for these mails is paid by the home government of Great Britain under that treaty to our Government, and with the payment of that money the colonies of New Zealand and New South Wales have nothing to do. It does not come out of their treasury, and if remitted it would inure to the treasury of Great Britain and not to the treasury of those colonies.

I understand that nothing has been done under that provision during the current year. Now, the gentleman's proposition is to appropriate directly to these colonies a part of the sum paid for the transportation of these mails and paid by Great Britain: in other words, Great Britain, pays, say, $100,000 to us for transporting her mails under the treaty to the colonies over our territory, and the gentleman proposes by this amendment to take, say, $40,000 of the money we get from the home government of Great Britain and give it to the colonies.

Now, we do have certain agreements or arrangements with the colonies not touching the closed mails but for the transmission of mails, for instance, from the colony to Canada and other countries than Great Britain. They are not to be affected by this amendment. It occurred to me that this, perhaps, was an awkward way to make a gift of forty or fifty thousand dollars a year to these colonies, for that is what it amounts to.

The gentleman from California, [Mr. DAVIS,] who offers the amendment, justifies it as a means to build up our trade with these colonies, stating that our exports last year to them were over $8,000,000 and our imports only $1,000,000. Still we should not forget that this compensation is received from Great Britain for services performed by us for that government under treaty and transportation of her mails. And while in some respects I have no great admiration for the policy of Great Britain, yet I do recollect that she is the mother country, and I recollect that she takes over one-half of all the exports of this country, enormous as they are, that we send out to the world amounting to many hundreds of millions of dollars, so that if we are to give this $40,000 to any government as an evidence of our good-will or to promote trade, or because it is not equitable for us to keep it, it occurs to me it is best to remit it to Great Britain. The truth is, in my opinion, that we fairly earn the money and that it should remain in our own Treasury. I desired to state the facts as I understand them, and having stated them I leave the question for the consideration of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from California.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 61, noes 27.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the consent of the Committee of the Whole House that the footing up of this second section of the bill be amended to make it correspond with the amendments incorporated by the Committee of the Whole.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair supposes that the gentleman would have a right to do that.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I have the correct figures before me, and will move to strike out "$1,915,258" and insert in lieu thereof "$2,005,258."

There was no objection.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Now, Mr. Chairman, it appears by the report of the Postmaster-General that the Post-Office Department is subjected to unusual and exorbitant charges by the Saint Louis Bridge Company for the transportation of the mails over the Mississippi River at Saint Louis. Under the provision of the act amendatory of the act incorporating that company, which will be found on page 123 of the Statutes at Large, it will be seen that by the second section of an act amendatory of an act approved the 26th of July, 1866, authorizing the construction of certain bridges and establishing them as post-roads, that this bridge is constituted and declared a post-road; for the second section reads:

Be it further enacted, That the said corporation may execute a mortgage, issue bonds, * * * and they are authorized to throw a bridge across the Mississippi River, which bridge when constructed shall be a post-road to carry the mails of the United States and to enjoy the rights and privileges of other post-roads, &c.

So that to remedy the difficulty under which the Department is now laboring I will ask unanimous consent to go back and insert at the proper place in this bill the following amendment.

Before that amendment is read, however, I will ask to have read half a dozen lines from a letter from the Postmaster-General.

The Clerk read as follows:

The second section of the act of July 20, 1868, authorizing the construction of a bridge between East Saint Louis and Saint Louis, should in my judgment be amended to read: "and no higher charge shall be made for the transportation over the same of the mails of the United States than the rate per mile paid for their transportation over the railroads or public highways leading to said bridge."

The amendment is as follows:

And the second section of an act entitled "An act amendatory of an act approved July 26, 1866, entitled 'An act to authorize the construction of certain bridges and to establish them as post-roads,' approved July 20, 1868," be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding the following words thereto: "and no higher charge shall be made for the transmission over the same of the mails of the United States than the rate per mile paid for their transportation over the railroads or public highways leading to said bridge."

Mr. WELLS. I object, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Then I give notice that I shall offer this amendment before asking the previous question in the House.

Mr. WELLS. I trust the gentleman will not press that amendment.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I made the request that I might go back to the clause of the bill to which this is properly attached, which is found upon the fourth page of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so stated. The gentleman from Missouri says that he objects. The Chair, however, stated that the gentleman from Kentucky asked unanimous consent that the amendment should be read. Of course the gentleman from Missouri could not object until he knew what the substance of the proposed amendment was.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Does the Chair hold that the gentleman from Missouri has a right to exclude the amendment by his objection?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair holds he has that right.

Mr. BLOUNT. It seems to me that the amendment is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment would be in order if offered at the proper time, undoubtedly; but this is a request for unanimous consent to go back and insert the amendment at some other point in the bill.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not see why it is necessary to go back.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WELLS] merely reserved the point of order, not the point as to where the amendment should come in.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the point of order which the gentleman makes, that you cannot return to a clause already passed upon.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Did the gentleman state he should object to returning, or simply that he reserved the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman simply reserved the point of order; and this is a point of order affecting the manner of proceeding.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I thought the gentleman from Kentucky had got the right to go back.

Mr. BLACKBURN. No, sir; I had asked unanimous consent to go back.

I move the committee rise and report the bill with the amendments to the House for its action.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CARLISLE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 6972) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. KENNA, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills and joint resolutions of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 6614) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 369) making an appropriation for filling up, draining, and placing in good sanitary condition the grounds south of the Capitol along the line of the old canal, and for other purposes;

A bill (S. No. 1396) authorizing the persons therein named to accept of certain decorations and presents therein named from foreign governments, and for other purposes;

A bill (S. No. 1618) to amend section 553 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the District of Columbia;

A bill (S. No. 1922) for the relief of Brigadier-General and Brevet Major-General Edward O. C. Ord, United States Army; and Joint resolution (S. R. No. 144) authorizing the loan of certain flags and bunting to the committee on inaugural ceremonies.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Before demanding the previous question on the Post-Office appropriation bill reported from the Committee of the Whole, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

And the second section of an act amendatory of an act approved July 26, [5,] 1866, entitled "An act to authorize the construction of certain bridges and to establish them as post-roads, approved July 20, 1868," be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding the following words thereto: "And no higher charge shall be made for the transmission over the same of the mails of the United States than the rate per mile paid for their transportation over the railroads or public highways leading to said bridge."

Mr. BLACKBURN. As I see that amendment is to create no little discussion, and as I was offering it in my own right and not under the instructions of the Committee on Appropriations, I will withdraw it. I now ask the previous question on the bill and amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is first on the amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. Is there a separate vote asked on any of the amendments?

Mr. WARNER. I think on account of its importance there should be a separate vote on the amendment of the gentleman from California, [Mr. PAGE.] It amounts practically to a subsidy.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands no separate vote is asked except on the amendment adopted on motion of the gentleman from California. The question is on agreeing to the other amendments.

The amendments on which a separate vote was not asked were agreed to.

The amendment of the Committee of the Whole on which a separate vote was asked was read, as follows:

In line 140, after the word "dollars," insert the following;

"Provided, That the Postmaster-General is authorized to pay to the colonies of New Zealand and New South Wales so much of the cost of the overland transportation of the British closed mails to and from Australia as he may deem just, not exceeding one-half of said cost; and the sum of $40,000 is hereby appropriated for that purpose."

The question being taken, there were—ayes 81, noes 30.

So (further count not being called for) the amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill, and will be taken by yeas and nays as required by the rule.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 228, nays 0, not voting 64; as follows:

BALTIMORE AND OHIO RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. WHYTE. If there is no further morning business I should like to have the consent of the Senate to take up a joint resolution reported by me from the Committee on the District of Columbia authorizing the settlement and ratification of an arrangement in respect to taxes between the District commissioners and the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company by which the District treasury will get some seventy-five thousand dollars which it wants at this time very much.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. R. No. 266) ratifying settlement of taxes made by the District commissioners with the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company. It ratifies and confirms the settlement made by the commissioners of the District of Columbia with the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company of the claim of the District upon that company for and on account of taxes due by the railroad company to the District up to July 1, 1879, and authorizes the commissioners to execute any vouchers or papers necessary to the final consummation of the settlement, and as evidence that the same is concluded and closed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the report read, or some explanation of the joint resolution.

Mr. WHYTE. I have a letter from the District commissioners, but I can in a brief statement make it manifest to the Senator from Vermont that this is a judicious settlement.

The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company and the District government have been involved in a series of disputes about the company's taxes for the last fourteen years. There have been various suits in the courts on the subject. Finally the District commissioners and the railroad company came together and under the direction of the committee on the District of Columbia for each House they were authorized to adjust, if it were possible, some compromise between the company and the District government. The original claim was about ninety thousand dollars, and they have adjusted their differences upon the basis of $75,000 cash. It has been put up by the company and is recommended by the District commissioners in their letter to be taken as a fair settlement.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us have the letter read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The letter will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, March 25, 1880.

SIR: In obedience to the request of the District Committee the commissioners have examined the question of the arrearages of general taxation of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. They find that the case has been in litigation since 1858. It was supposed that a final decision would be reached during the present term of the supreme court, but it now seems most probable that the case will go over for another year. A statement of the legal status of the case, by the attorney of the District, is inclosed herewith. The attorney says:

"The risk to the District of being beaten by the judgment of the supreme court, has, in my opinion, no appreciable value.

"The company filed its bill and secured a restraining order in 1858, and for seventeen years the corporation of Washington and the District seemed to acquiesce in the claimed exemption of the company's property from taxation. During these years the company might be excused from watching assessments of its property, and might suppose that no further effort would be made to enforce taxation against it. It would seem that the renewed effort of the District to enforce taxation upon the property of the company in 1875 ought to have been a notice sufficient to put it upon its guard as to assessments since that date.

"Under all these circumstances, I have advised the commissioners that in my opinion this was a case for the discriminating exercise of a power to adjust the differences between the parties by effecting a compromise which should substantially secure the claims of the District and equitably respect the rights of the company."

From this opinion of the attorney it would seem most probable that the district may in time enforce the collection of the entire tax heretofore levied with full penalties and accrued interest. It lies with Congress to determine whether any compromise is advisable in such a case.

In the absence of specific law defining a basis upon which the property of steam railways should be assessed the valuations were for some years irregular and excessive.

In the matter of the arrearages of general taxes which are now in litigation, it would seem to be to the interest of the parties concerned to effect such a compromise as, in the language of the attorney above quoted, will "substantially secure the claims of the District and equitably respect the rights of the company."

The amount now standing on the books of the assessor's office as due from the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad to July 1st, 1879, is $90,543.26; with interest and penalties included to March 1st, 1880, the total is $136,826.12.

The company claims that the assessments against the road and upon its real estate and improvements have been excessive, and asks that they be reduced.

The commissioners find that by a joint resolution of the city councils, approved May 30, 1849, the track of the railroad company was exempted from taxation for thirty years.

The State tax of Maryland is one-half of 1 per cent. upon the gross receipts, and the county taxes are on the basis of $12,500 per mile for double track main line, $7,500 for single track main line, and $2,500 per mile for sidings. The commissioners are of the opinion that the road and rolling stock may equitably be assessed within the limits of the district at $15,500 per mile for the double track main line, at $7,500 per mile for the single track, and $2,500 per mile for spurs; that the real estate may be placed upon the mean of the valuation of the adjoining private property, exempting such ground as is used purely as right of way, and that buildings and improvements may be assessed at three fifths of original cost.

A readjustment of the assessment valuations, as accurate as can be made within the limited time allowed, adding 6 per cent. interest from the dates at which such interest accrues, gives a total of $69,524.68. Considering the past history of the case and prospect of future litigation, the commissioners think that the sum of $75,000 represents a fair basis of compromise for the indebtedness of the road up to July 1, 1879.

The company have placed in the hands of the commissioners the sum of $75,000, which amount is to be turned into the Treasury to the credit of the District when the District Committee shall have approved of the proposed settlement, and shall have agreed to recommend to the House the passage of a resolution authorizing the compromise.

Very respectfully,

J. DENT,
THOS. P. MORGAN,
W. J. TWINING,
Major of Engineers, United States Army,
Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

Hon. EPPA HUNTON,
Chairman House Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. EDMUNDS rose.

Mr. WHYTE. Will the Senator from Vermont before he proceeds allow me to add that the letter was written last year. Then the members of the sub-committee on this side and of the other House examined into the subject, and we concluded that that was the very best settlement that the United States could make.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This presents one of those not singular spectacles of a great corporation having power and influence resisting, as it appears here, from 1858, twenty-three years, the taxation of its property as the property of private and humble individuals having a natural existence is taxed in the District of Columbia. I say it is not singular, for I suppose every State has had similar experiences.

We have not been told yet what are the legal grounds upon which the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company resist the contribution which is asked of them in respect of their property in this District; in other words, the point on which they went to law. Almost any moderate lawyer, like the average of us Senators, can find points enough to get up a defensive lawsuit at all times and in all places, and, to borrow a long-time-ago expression, "here or elsewhere," and I hope nobody will take offense at that remark. Now it seems this company on one reason or another chose not to pay its taxes, and it is proposed that we shall give the company the difference between $75,000 and ninety-odd thousand dollars of actual assessed taxation, saying nothing about penalties and interest, simply because the commissioners report that if the company had attended to its interests during this litigation and had caused the assessments from year to year that were made to be reviewed by some proper authority, if there were any, the commissioners now think that the assessments might have been somewhat reduced; so that in their time they would have been brought down, if I understand this letter, to sixty-nine thousand and odd dollars. During all this period, then, it appears that on the company's own theory unless they are not at all liable to taxation, they ought to have paid sums which now would amount to $69,000. If you put merely the interest upon those yearly sums that they ought to have paid at 6 per cent. (or at that delightful rate that another body to which I am not entitled to refer thinks interest ought to go, 3 per cent.) it would still come to a very large sum in excess of this $75,000.

I believe as to all these corporate questions, unless it is shown to us that there is a real, a difficult doubt, if I may use such an expression, as to some matter of law or fact, it is the part of the wise mission of a legislative body that means to protect the rights of living citizens, to insist that the citizens who do not live,—that is to say artificial personages, corporations,—shall contribute their share to the public protection and the public safety and the public improvement. I think in such a case it is a wise policy not to make peace and not to throw off a single penny of what the law entitles the public to exact from that particular species of individuals, because the old Scotch proverb, if it be a Scotch proverb, that if you give an inch an ell will be taken on the next occasion, applies with great force to corporations, particularly to powerful ones.

Here it appears that in the Supreme Court, as I suppose, of the United States, although it does not say that, there is pending the question of the legality of these taxes, which have been in one form or another resisted for more than twenty years. Let that question be decided. If it turns out that the only persons who are entitled to escape from taxation in this District are the artificial ones that exist in it or come into it, then we shall know that it is our duty to consider what step can be taken next. If it turns out that they are, like natural persons, bound to have their property assessed and to pay upon it, then, I submit, it is no part of our mission as legislators to undertake, because they are great and powerful, and large sums are involved, to mitigate the action of the taxing authorities any more than it would be in the case of every one of probably a thousand individuals in this city at this moment who feel, and it may be justly, that their personal assessments have been excessive and ought to be reduced. I know some in my neighborhood who upon the theory of this compromise, supposing it to be sound, would be justly entitled to come forward and start a lawsuit and then propose to settle by having their assessments reduced to what the neighbors would think was a fair thing.

It may be that there is so much doubt in respect of the right of the District of Columbia to recover these taxes at all, that this compromise, as it is called, is a wise thing, because compromises are sometimes wise; but the commissioners tell us that their counsel reports that the value to be obtained by this payment, in respect of the danger of the legal results, is nil. In such a case I must say, with all respect to the good that corporations do in this world and in this country, and particularly the great ones—the greater the corporation the greater the good provided they exercise their great strength wisely and fairly—I must say that particularly in the instance of corporations, it is not the case for mitigation and compromise in such matter; and as one taxpayer in this small District, I should be glad to have the counsel for the District of Columbia (and I am bound to assume that he will do it well) try to find out for this time and for all time whether the pretension set up by the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company against being taxed in this District will stand in law or not. How do we know that day after to-morrow, after this joint resolution shall have passed and become a law, the assessment for this year will not be resisted upon the same ground that it has been before, and then a fresh injunction, fresh lawsuits to run for eight or ten years before you can get to a final decision, and the money tied up all the time, will appear?

I should think it better, therefore, for the public interest, to run what the attorney says is practically no risk at all, but I will assume that it is a great risk, and let the right between the District of Columbia and this corporation in respect of this taxation be settled, as it is so near a settlement, by a decision which will make an end of it, and not make a compromise which leaves it open day after to-morrow to a fresh litigation, a fresh injunction, and a fresh refusal to pay taxes.

I am pretty sure that if the most illustrious citizen in the District of Columbia, whoever he may be, had resisted the payment of his taxes for ten or twenty years, and the thing had very nearly reached a solution in the Supreme Court of the United States, we should think we were not doing our duty as exerting the legislative power of this District to make a settlement and a compromise with him and leave all his brother tax-payers who might or might not stand upon the same ground, (they certainly could stand upon some other,) to pay their assessed proportion.

I believe that the public interest, the private interest, justice, and fair play, make it most important that any disputes concerning the taxation of property should not be made the subject of trade and compromise, however wise and correct such a compromise might be in disputes between private individuals, because it is a matter in which everybody is interested and interested for himself as well as in common with every one of his neighbors.

My friend from Maryland knows the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company much better than I do; and I am not making any criticism upon them; if they have legal rights let them make them out; if they have not legal rights and are bound like other people to pay taxes let them pay them to the end. I very much hope that under all the circumstances my friend from Maryland will not press the passage of this bill. Let us have the right settled, because I assume that it is not any mere technical question of formality that has been going on so long; that sometimes arises; but it is some question of real interest to the other tax-payers as well as to this company in this District respecting whether this company is bound to contribute to the expenses of the District according to the proportion of its property that is within it like other people. If that be so—perhaps my friend will show that it is not—then I should think it would be for the interest of the public as well as of the company if it is upright and fair—and I have no doubt it is—standing on its rights to have it settled and determined, and then we should know what to do.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, if the premises of the Senator from Vermont were correct, I might probably concur in his conclusion. If there was some question of law between these parties which was to be finally determined by the adjudications of the Supreme Court, I would concur with him in the view that no compromise or settlement should be made; but I do not think he has read with his usual accuracy the statement of the District commissioners. In the first place, there is a controversy and was a controversy at that time in regard to the right of the city to tax the track of the company for thirty years. That has passed away, that has gone; the thirty years have expired.

That was one of the questions involved; but in addition to that the assessments themselves were excessive in their character, and the court below upon the application of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company restrained the commissioners of the District from making collection upon the double question as to the right to assess the track, and also as to the correctness of the basis of assessment. That question went to the courts, besides the question of exemption that has been pending for a long time. In conjunction with that question, which would only determine a subject that has already passed, because the thirty years have expired, there was this additional question as to the proper basis of assessment in regard to this company, what was to be the valuation of the rolling-stock per mile within the District; and it is a very nice question. It is not assessing the track which is visible, but it is assessing the rolling-stock which comes to-day and goes to-morrow, the moving stock of the company, which is assessed per mile within the District of Columbia so much.

That was one of the greatest difficulties in this case. We saw it when the subject was brought before the committees at the last session, and we knew that Congress was not the proper place to determine that question; that if these disputes existed they ought to be determined by the District commissioners through their agent, the treasurer and assessor, and as far as the simple legal question was concerned, probably the opinion of the attorney was sufficient. But the other question came up, Was this company really excessively taxed, and if it was excessively taxed, while this question is pending, is it not better to ascertain a basis upon which they shall pay taxes for the past, as also taxes for the future?

The Senator will see that this settlement only goes up to the 1st of July, 1879. There is no dispute, as I understand, between the company and the District commissioners since July 1, 1879. When they examined the assessment they found that there were excessive taxes charged against this company, and through their agents they have made a fair and equitable ascertainment of the real indebtedness of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company prior to July, 1879, and have reported to us that in lieu of $90,000, which was the sum charged at the period when the resistance took place, or was the sum which would have been due by this company as of the 1st of July upon the basis which had been set up at the time of the difficulty, $75,000 was full and ample payment by way of adjustment for this company to pay as of the 1st of July, 1879. As to the future there is no controversy. I understand that has all been adjusted. They are paying regularly, and are ready to pay regularly. There is no dispute as to the amount of their tax bills now; and this measure is only to settle a long pending controversy which will not absolutely be settled, as I understand it, by the determination of the courts because behind all that is the question of excessive taxation, and I apprehend that the Senator from Vermont only wants to exact from the corporation a just payment as he would from a citizen. While I agree with him in all his fears of, and in all his animadversions against those corporations that seek special advantage over private persons, I do not think that those remarks apply to this case because this company has not refused to pay what it considers a fair and just amount for it to contribute by way of taxation, and it was only to have the construction of the courts upon the question of exemption that they went to the Supreme Court.

I have no interest in it except that it struck me after the report of the commissioners, after conversations with the commissioners, after consultation with members of the Committee on the District of Columbia in the House of Representatives, that this was a fair and just settlement and yielding to this company no more than it was honestly entitled to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I can hardly imagine it possible that any court would grant an injunction in favor of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company on the ground that the assessing officers assessed it excessively. That is a matter that every tax law I ever heard of has left to the assessing authority itself and not to a court to determine. If the Senate should set the example now of holding that the excessiveness of assessments is a subject for either legislation or judicial consideration, then you will find that you cannot carry on a government by the whole Congress of the United States even on the fifteen square miles that constitute the District of Columbia; you will have a lawsuit or a petition from nine-tenths of all the inhabitants and citizens of any territory in which you adopt any such rule as that.

I never heard of a case where any court or any judge, no matter how remote or low the court might be, undertook to restrain the collection of a tax on the ground that the taxing officers had said that the value of a locomotive or the value of a horse or the number of locomotives or the number of horses that a particular person ought to pay tax on was excessive.

Mr. WHYTE. May I ask the Senator from Vermont if he ever knew a tax law that did not give a right of appeal to a court to review the tax commissioners' assessments?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I never knew a tax law that did. In a State where you have an executive institution called a levy court, which is a board of supervisors, or a board of civil authority, as it would be called in the State that I come from, there are provisions that any person feeling himself aggrieved by the assessing officer or officers who come around to his house on a given day fixed by law to ascertain what he has and how much it is worth with a view to taxation, may appeal to another board having the same power and of the same character who are supposed to be superior to the first in point of numbers or capacity for a review. That is true enough; but I never heard of any tax law that authorized any judicial court, in the sense of trying a contest of rights, to review the action of the taxing officers on questions of value or questions of amount anywhere. I think my friend from Maryland will agree with me that that is a pretty fair statement of the law in every State of the United States and the law of every civilized country of which we have any knowledge on the face of the globe.

Now, I say that no law in force in the District of Columbia, I think, at any time has authorized any corporation or person complaining of excessive assessment to appeal to any one of the judges or all of them of the supreme court of the District of Columbia for a review of that assessment with a view to reducing it. I do not think my friend from Maryland can furnish us any such statute as that. The ground only upon which the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, I think, could have appealed to the supreme court of the District of Columbia by bill in equity was the ground that the imposition of taxes upon them in the manner and form, and not in the amount, in which they were imposed by the taxing authority here, was contrary to law, and that it is no part of the jurisdiction of the supreme court of the District of Columbia to decide whether a locomotive is worth $5,000 or $25,000 or to decide whether twenty-five locomotives found here on the 1st day of May or the 1st day of July are employed in business here or are not so employed. All such questions in every country that can get on in its taxing power, must be left to the appointed officers and agents of the people to do that thing, because if one man can resist on the ground that he is charged too much for his cows or his horses or the goods in his store or that the assessing officers think he has 5,000 yards of cotton in his store when he only has 4,900, you can break down government entirely by restraining lawsuits; every man could go into court and get an injunction against any tax upon him because some little error of judgment, of opinion, of enumeration of quantities or of judgments as to values would furnish the ground for stopping the whole transaction of taxation.

So, as I understand it, courts have always and everywhere declined to undertake either to overrule or to regulate the authority in the way of judgment and enumeration which the tax officers by law are required to exercise, and have held that these taxing officers in those respects are just as supreme and final in their judgments and opinion as is the highest court of the land itself in its judgment and opinion upon judicial questions that come before it. That is what I think the law is. I think it is the law here.

Now, therefore, I respectfully submit that it is not the thing for the Senate of the United States to undertake to throw off anything from whatever may be legally due from this company on the ground that the taxation was excessive; that is, either that too many locomotives and cars were charged to them as employed in business here, or that they were valued at too high a price.

Mr. WHYTE. If the Senator from Vermont will allow me, I do not want to be put in any false position.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not wish to put my friend in any false position.

Mr. WHYTE. When I said "excessive" I had reference to the company, not to the amount of taxation on individual things; that certain things were taxed which ought not to have been taxed, in addition to the claim of exemption. I mean by that that there were certain specific exemptions, and certain things were assessed which ought not to have been assessed without any special exemption under the law. That is what I mean.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I suppose that the taxing law in this District during all this time was in substance, (aside from offset of debts and so on) what it is now and what it is in the State of Maryland and everywhere else,—a general system by which all the property, real and personal, within the jurisdiction of the taxing power should be subject to an assessment and a valuation fixed upon it and then a rate which, applied to that and to all other property in the District, is imposed upon it to produce the money that we call a tax. I suppose that must be the general state of the law.

Mr. WHYTE. If the Senator will look at the report, he will find that the rolling-stock is assessed by the mile and not by engines, by horses, or by cars; the rolling-stock at so much per mile is assessed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well. Now, the assessment of rolling-stock per mile is either warranted by law as distinguished from an assessment in specie, or it is not. If the law did not authorize the taxing authorities of the District to assess this rolling-stock by the mile in that mode, then the assessment, instead of being excessive, was absolutely illegal. That is one thing. If it is, let us find it out.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Vermont allow me to ask him if it be not the rule of law in this country everywhere substantially that the property of the citizen cannot be taken from him without due process of law, that due process of law meaning in case of the settlement of the right of possession or ownership of property a judgment of a court, and in the case of the taxing power a tribunal authorized to review taxes so constituted that its ruling on questions of law may by certiorari or some other similar process be re-examined by the supreme judicial power of the State, with the jurisdiction where the thing occurs? But at the same time, where the taxing power has jurisdiction to say how much tax a man shall pay on his personal property, and it thinks he has $100,000 when he has only $50,000, or taxes something to him that ought to be taxed to somebody else, that is not wholly void so that the citizen can recover it by suit at law as if it were a totally illegal transaction, but it is an error of law which is to be revised only by certiorari or some other advising process addressed to the taxing power. So that in the case which the Senator from Maryland puts, the tax commissioners of the District being authorized to say how much tax on personal property or how much tax on real property this company should pay if they err in the respect which the Senator from Maryland states, the method of revision is not by suit at law as if their whole proceeding were void or as if it were void pro tanto, but by certiorari commanding the tax commissioners of the District to certify to the supreme court the principle on which they proceeded and then upon their answer and certificate an order to them to revise that proceeding in the particular in which it is incorrect.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts is, as far as I am able to comprehend it, a perfectly sound one, and I did not know that what I had said would, in his judgment, come in conflict with it at all.

What I undertook to say on this question about the taxing per mile was this: if the tax laws of the District of Columbia say that all personal property in the District shall be set in the list at its value for taxation and the taxing officers of the District, instead of setting the property of this company in the District in the list at its value but estimated it, took an arbitrary rule without regard to value and say, because there are two miles of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad in this District and there are thirty-eight miles out of it between here and the city of Baltimore, and three hundred miles out of it, or whatever the distance may be, between here and the line of West Virginia, therefore it shall be taxed in the proportion that these two miles bear to the other thirty-eight between here and Baltimore, or that they bear to the other three hundred between here and West Virginia, then I say that, in my judgment, such a taxation would be open to legal inquiry as to whether they had any authority at all to impose an arbitrary rule without any reference to the value of locomotives and cars here upon the company, and that would be for a judicial court to decide; but if they have the legal authority to consider the length of the road in this District as furnishing the ground for believing that the value of the personal property here on the whole is too much, then whether they were right or wrong in their ground, their valuation of the personal property would be absolutely conclusive. I suppose that is the law.

If it be, as the Senator from Maryland thinks it to be, that this estimate per mile—which I will assume to have been legal in respect of its form—was too much in respect of its quantum, then you have got back to exactly the place where we started; and that is that you are undertaking by the action of this Senate to review, upon a letter of the commissioners, the action of the taxing officers in favor of this corporation, and to give it $15,000 because in its judgment the taxing officers have assessed it $15,000 too much in respect to their judgment of the value of its property in this District. I cannot consent to do that. I cannot consent to do it supposing I believed it to be true that there was an excess of $15,000, because the moment you undertake by legislative authority to correct temporary evils and what we think to be pieces of injustice, you have opened the door to an endless field of applications that stand in favor of private individuals on exactly the same grounds. The result is a review in every case where a man says the assessors have charged him too much, and we are to be called upon to decide in each case whether they have done it or not.

And that brings me back to what I started out with, and that is that taxing questions, particularly with corporations, are not those which ought to be compromised and mitigated by the action of the legislative authority; but they ought to be left, for good or ill, to such rights as the constituted officers to inquire into such matters, courts and all, may determine. Then if it turns out at the end of a lawsuit that the law is imperfect or unjust or inadequate to the ends for which it was designed, let the legislative power provide a new law. So it appears to me without reference to the intrinsic merits, whatever they may be, of this particular settlement, that it is entering on a species of legislation that we ought to be very shy of.

There is another thing that I should like to say. I understand from my friend from Maryland or from a remark which he dropped, that the rate or the quantum of future taxation between this company and the District has been settled by the commissioners and the company as a part of this arrangement. Am I right about that?

Mr. WHYTE. I so understand. There is no dispute as to the future.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very good. That having been settled, then this act of Congress proposes to ratify that settlement, which I assume is in writing, and we do not know what it is. Suppose the commissioners of the District of Columbia have agreed that hereafter the rate shall be a thousand dollars a mile for the two miles of the company's track in this District, and we ratify that; then we have made a contract with the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company for I do not know what indefinate future that they shall be taxed at that rate, no other. I do not propose to enter into any such contract, either by inference or expression; and as this resolution which says that we ratify the settlement that has been made between these parties and a part of that settlement arranges for the rate of future taxation, I certainly hope that no man in the Senate will vote for it, however good it is otherwise; and I certainly hope my friend from Maryland will not. And yet the effect of this measure, as it reads, is to ratify whatever that settlement is, be it much or little. I do not think that ought to be so.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, the Senator from Vermont always enunciates his law opinions with such judicial temper and in such an ex cathedra manner that it seems almost immodesty ever to dispute with him any legal proposition that he enunciates. Nevertheless, from my experience in tax cases in my own State, while I know nothing about the tax law of Vermont, I should be very sorry if any such law existed in Maryland as that which he supposes to exist in the civilized world—that you have no right of appeal and no right of review in the courts of your State over an assessment made by the executive officers appointed under a law of the State to value property, and that there is no power to stop a tyrannical collection of taxes by an executive tax officer. I cannot believe in any such law as that. I have operated under an entirely different system, stopped the tax-assessor from taking possession of property which was not liable to be taxed, although not specially exempted; and so in regard to this case of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, there was no specific law fixing a basis for the assessment of taxes upon this property; and that is the difficulty in the whole case. The commissioners of the District expressly state that that is the reason of the difficulty that occurred:

> In the absence of specific law defining a basis upon which the property of steam-railways should be assessed the valuations were for some years irregular and excessive.

Now, does the Senator from Vermont desire that those excessive and irregular valuations should under proper authority be made equitable and fair? I am sure he does; and therefore in the absence of specific law upon the subject, it must be left to the judgment and discretion of somebody, and to-day to whom does the Senator from Vermont leave that power to assess the value of property? To the treasurer and assessor of this District under the supervision of the District commissioners; and therefore when these gentlemen sit down to adjust between the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company and the District of Columbia the fair amount of taxes which that company should pay, where can you find more knowledge of what that assessment ought to be, or an honester desire to make it fair to the tax-payers and just to the District? Can we as Senators sit down here and take up all the prices of property, all the moving material upon the railway, all its little station-houses and watch-boxes, and so on, and go into accurate calculation of how much we ought to charge this company? Clearly not; and therefore when this judicial inquiry has been lasting for so many years, when at last this company comes to us and says "we will pay whatever your officers, the District commissioners and the treasurer and assessor of taxes in the District of Columbia, say is just and right up to 1879; we will pay every dollar of the money, and as an evidence of our good faith, without receipt, without paper, for we have got no receipt and no papers, we will deposit in the hands of the commissioners the amount that they ascertained to be due to wait for Congress to ratify and confirm our settlement," what should be done? That is the position of this company. I think it is fair and I think it is just, and I hope that the Senate will vote in favor of this settlement.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I confess that I do not feel, like my friend from Maryland, the greatest possible gratitude to the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company for putting $75,000 into the hands of these commissioners to get rid of a legal obligation to pay $130,000.

There is a slight margin of $55,000 to be gained by this deposit; and therefore the extent of my admiration at the amazing generosity and confidence of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company is not so great as that of my friend from Maryland. If these commissioners are authorized by law as the supervising taxing officers of this town—and I did not know that they were that—to abate and mitigate taxes where they consider them to be excessive, then you do not need to pass this bill to allow them to do it; but the law, I believe, has not vested in the commissioners of the District of Columbia any such enormous power as that. They may be invested, (although I do not remember how that is,) with the power on the occasion of an assessment and while it is live and warm, in the time of it, to hear an appeal from the three or five assessors, or whatever the number may be, who go about at the appointed times for the purpose of assessing property, and to determine then and there whether that assessment is excessive, and if so mitigate it, and it is entered in the tax-books accordingly. After that is done, I respectfully submit that they have not and ought not to have any more power over any further abatements or mitigation in favor of people who insist upon it that they are taxed too much, than any man in the streets has. I do not know any State that authorizes its governor or any other of its officials to proceed to retry in favor of applicants, after the occasion has gone by, the question whether they ought to pay all the taxes that are charged to them on the books or not. You cannot carry on a government in that way, and nobody tries to do it. Therefore it is perfectly manifest that the commissioners of the District of Columbia have no more power to abate this $55,000 of what this company will have to pay if they are beaten in the lawsuit, than I have individually; and if you pass this bill to make this settlement, what are you going to do next week when the Metropolitan Railroad Company with its $175,000 (if that be the amount) of unpaid assessments in the nature of taxation on street improvements, and regular taxation too, perhaps, comes forward and says, "Here according to the way your tax people have assessed us and figured it up we owe the United States $175,000; we have been declining to pay for some years; we will pay now if you will take $100,000?" And then we are to do that. Then there is to be another compromise with, say, the Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company, which I believe is not so deeply in with respect to a failure to pay the just burdens—I mean just in principle; I cannot go into the question of quantity—that the taxing power has imposed upon them.

I wish to repeat, and then I am done with this whole matter, what I said a little while ago, that my belief is that if any private persons, and there are a good many of them, who feel that they are unjustly and excessively taxed, were to come here with a proposition and say "it appears from the assessments and the computations and the interest and the penalties that we owe the District of Columbia for taxes $25,000; we have begun a lawsuit about it, but we will square up for $15,000," they could not get a single vote. They would be told "settle your controversy in the tribunals and by the methods the law has provided; we are not a court of appeal in respect of the imposition of taxes as applied to particular individuals; we cannot be in the nature of things, because we cannot do justice. If we do it to one we must do it to all, and in the case of any one we should be as likely to go wrong as to go right, because we have not the means, the machinery for minute and careful investigation." That is what we should answer and answer rightly. The Legislature of any State would answer in that way in the ten thousand cases that in every State arise every year of men who insist upon it that the taxation upon them is irregular or excessive, and I never heard of a State Legislature that undertook to go into a consideration of that particular individual case. We have done it, I know, in Congress in respect of classes of people whom we thought had been outraged by the illegal and arbitrary conduct of the board of public works or somebody else, and held that, treated as a class, provision ought to be made for a quasi-judicial inquiry and a proper amount of redress allowed. That is true enough; but when it comes to invoking the legislative power to go into a contract settlement with a great corporation by which it throws off about one-third of the whole amount of the taxes that, if we are entitled to have any at all, are due and payable, it appears to me is a case which has no parallel and no precedent that I know of.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the third reading of the joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. COCKRELL in the chair.) The question is, Shall the joint resolution be ordered to a third reading? upon which the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CONKLING. Before voting on the question of the third reading, I should like to inquire what was the sum total of the taxes claimed or found to be due?

Mr. WHYTE. Ninety thousand dollars without interest, and the case has been in court fifteen or sixteen years. With the interest added up to this time it would be $130,000, and the case has been in court since 1858.

Mr. CONKLING. How much does this propose to take?

Mr. WHYTE. Seventy-five thousand dollars, settled on adjustment between the District commissioners and the company, and under the examination of the committees of the two Houses.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I understand this settlement to have been effected by the action of the commissioners of this District, fully understanding all the facts in the case, and they have recommended this settlement to Congress. Upon that state of fact, in view of the letter from the commissioners, I think this resolution should pass.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 38, nays 7; as follows:

YEAS—38.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 6972) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (S. No. 1396) authorizing the persons therein named to accept of certain decorations and presents therein named from foreign governments, and for other purposes;

A bill (S. No. 1618) to amend section 553 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the District of Columbia;

A bill (S. No. 1922) for the relief of Brigadier-General and Brevet Major-General Edward O. C. Ord, United States Army;

A bill (H. R. No. 6614) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 144) authorizing the loan of certain flags and buntings to the committee on inaugural ceremonies; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 369) making an appropriation for filling up, draining, and placing in good sanitary condition the grounds south of the Capitol along the line of the old canal, and for other purposes.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BOOTH, from the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 6532) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, reported it with amendments.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 6972) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

LANDS IN SEVERALTY TO INDIANS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. COCKRELL in the chair.) The hour of half past one o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate its unfinished business, being Senate bill No. 1773.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1773) to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians on the various reservations, and to extend the protection of the laws of the States and Territories over the Indians, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.]

Mr. MORGAN. I believe that the Senator from Massachusetts is willing to accept my proposition as a modification of his amendment, if I am correctly informed about it.

Mr. TELLER. Let the amendment be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment and the amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] is in section 6, line 6, after the word "reside," to insert:

And are hereby declared to have become citizens of the United States and entitled as such to the full protection of the Constitution and laws.

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] proposes to add to this amendment the following words:

Provided, That an Indian, when he or she accepts land in severalty, shall not thereby forfeit any right in or to any property or annuity to which he or she would be entitled as a member of the tribe, or his or her right to participate with such tribe in the disposal of any land or other property held in common by such tribe.

Mr. HOAR. I said to the Senator from Alabama that I would accept his amendment just now, but on hearing it read—I had not heard it read when I said I would accept it—it seems to me that it would be better to move it as a separate amendment. It reserves a distinct right; and if my amendment is put on the bill, the Senator's can then be added, or I will consent that a vote shall be taken upon his first, or if his is put on to the bill, mine may be added; but I desire to have accompanying this separate title to land with all the responsibilities it involves and this direct enactment that the Indian is to be subject to all the obligations of citizenship in a State and all its burdens and all its civil and criminal laws of the State and Territory, a citizen's right to protect himself. I would prefer, if the Senator will permit me to withdraw my assent, to have the vote taken on my amendment separately, because it seems to me that the two things are distinct. I do not think there is any reason for allowing the Indian's rights in the annuities and other property belonging to the tribe, to be forfeited, as is guarded against by the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. MORGAN. I am entirely willing that a separate vote should be taken on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, and I will withdraw my amendment until after action on his.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There being no objection, the Senator from Alabama for the present withdraws his amendment; and the question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President, I want the attention of the Senator from Texas a moment. I had intended to call up the naval appropriation bill to-day, which is now ready for the action of the Senate, but I wish to consult the convenience of the Senator from Texas. Does he prefer that it should be postponed until to-morrow, with the hope of concluding this bill to-day? Perhaps it can be done; if not, I should like to call up the naval bill now.

Mr. COKE. I would say in reply to the Senator from Minnesota that it is my purpose, if I can, to press this bill to a vote to-day. If I cannot, of course I shall yield to the Senator to-morrow that this bill be informally laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.]

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, when this bill was up for discussion last week, I was reminded by the honorable chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, that in my opposition to this bill I was putting my judgment against that of the President, the Secretary of the Interior, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, the board of Indian commissioners, and the honorable Committee on Indian Affairs of the Senate. I know the enormity of the crime of differing with such high and intelligent authority on this question, and I know very well what it costs to differ with a committee of the Senate of the character of this committee. I know how very futile any opposition may be to a measure that has received the sanction of this committee, and that is backed up by the high authority back and beyond this committee, of which the chairman spoke. I know it is not a pleasant thing to forego the smiles of approval of the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and to differ with this honorable committee upon a subject of this character. But, as I regard it, every Senator has a duty to do as he understands it, and not as somebody else understands it. It is not the first time that I have differed with the Committee on Indian Affairs, and I have differed with other Senate committees on a good many things where undoubtedly the committees were right and I was wrong; and yet I was in the exercise of a right. I was in the discharge of a duty. Upon this question of the Indians, how they should be managed and how they should be treated, I have very fixed and decided opinions, opinions formed after many years of observation and not a little study. I am not here to see how I can make my way smooth and my path even, how I can get rid of labor and responsibility. I know that it is much easier, upon questions of this kind, involving difficult and doubtful things, to consult a committee and follow the crowd, and then if the proposition shall fail, if the future shall demonstrate its folly and its lack of wisdom, lay the blame upon the committee, or on the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, or on the Secretary of the Interior. I know that that is not infrequently done in this body and in other places; but it has not been given to me to see my duty in that way. I know how wearisome a discussion of the Indian question is to the Senate, and I know how little attention is paid to a discussion of this character, when the most of the Senators have already formed their opinions upon the proper legislation, or if they have not, are disposed to say that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior and the committee, to whom all this great question is left, ought to know better than anybody else, and that the easiest and best way is to follow their lead.

Mr. President, if I was totally unacquainted with this question, I might be disposed to surrender my judgment; but with my knowledge, with my observation, with my study, I believe, as the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] said yesterday, this is a bill fraught with evil. This is a bill that, in my judgment, ought to be entitled "A bill to despoil the Indians of their lands and to make them vagabonds on the face of the earth," because, in my view, that is the result of this kind of legislation. I know, as I said the other day, that many well-meaning people are clamoring for this legislation, and I do not know that my theory of the solution of this problem is correct: I am not morally certain that it is. I go upon my judgment, my best-informed judgment after I have informed it as well as I could. I do not believe there is a Senator in this Chamber who is familiar with this Indian problem that would accept unlimited authority to deal with this question who would not accept it with grave doubts and misgivings as to what would be the outcome and what would be the result of his honest and energetic efforts in that line. It is a problem difficult to solve; it has brought the attention of the very best men in this country to it for two hundred years and they have failed; and if we fail, we only do what others have done; yet we ought to profit something by the light of experience. The failure of other methods ought to induce us to look with care upon any new measure if one is introduced. But this bill is not a new measure; it is old and much older than this Government. For two hundred and fifty years this very question has been pressed upon the American people. At times it has been tried and at times it has been abandoned. It may be proclaimed by the Secretary of the Interior and by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and by the board of Indian commissioners and by the Committee on Indian Affairs of the Senate that it has not been a failure, but I say here to-day that a careful examination of history will prove that it has been an entire failure, and I am here to-day to attempt to prove it.

It does not do to come here and say that the agent at this place and the agent at the other place is to be taken as authority that the intelligent Indians are demanding this kind of legislation. It is the pet theory of the Secretary of the Interior, it is the pet theory of all officials under him, because they would not be under him if they did not advocate this theory of his with reference to the civilizing of the Indians by virtue of giving them land in severalty. The agent on a reservation who makes his report, knows what the theory of the Commissioner is, he knows what the theory of the Secretary is, and he is in duty bound to show his loyalty and his fealty by sending up his report, first, that his Indians are progressing, because if they are not progressing there is danger that some other man will take his place, and if they are progressing, he puts that down as one of the items to his credit, and then, to make himself strong with the Department, he declares that the Indians are clamoring for land in severalty.

I said the other day that an examination of the reports from 1816 up would show that it has been the cry of all the agents everywhere, with rare exceptions, "My Indians are making rapid progress in civilization," and yet to-day very many of the Indians who have thus been reported year after year are actually on the retrograde; and a careful examination of the statistics will show that they are not advancing, but they have taken the downward grade, and are not as well off to-day as they were some years since. I picked up, the other day, the report of 1878 of the agent for the Pyramid Lake Indians in Nevada. I will not stop to read it. I went back for seven or eight years, and I found that every year the Indian agent had reported, "My Indians are making rapid progress in civilization." I believe he nowhere alluded to the fact that they wanted land in severalty, but he said that they were on the high road of progress. But a change came; they had a new agent at the Pyramid Lake, and this man says in his first report: "In looking over the reports for ten years, I find every year it is reported that these Indians are making progress in civilization; but now I want, as I start out, that the facts shall be known." And then he goes on and pictures out the character of the Indian that he has to deal with—degraded, debased—that if he ever had made any progress it must have been when he started in the very lowest possible scale of human beings. That is a fair sample of the reports that come up from the various Indian agents all over the land. It is their interest to make such reports. They are a class of men that, as a general thing, are sent out because they cannot make a living in the East. They are picked up as broken-down politicians, or one-horse preachers that have been unable to supply themselves with a congregation. They go to an Indian agency at a salary that will not employ, in the West in most cases, an ordinary clerk, and hardly a porter. They take these positions; they desire to keep them, whether it is for the salary or whether it is for the perquisites I leave to others to say, but they desire to keep them, and it is their interest that they make these statements that little by little these men are progressing; and yet when a new and honest agent goes he frankly says, "these people can have made no progress at all."

Mr. President, it was said here the other day, it is said in the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and in the report of the Secretary of the Interior, and I presume it will be found in the report of the board of Indian commissioners if we shall ever be able to get it, that the Indians who have taken land in severalty have rapidly advanced in the ways of civilized life. I denied that the other day, I deny that to-day, and I deny it in the face of the constant manner in which it was stated on the floor of the Senate the other day in reply to me. I say that the evidence is against that declaration: that an examination of the reports made by the Secretary himself, made by the Commissioner himself year after year, will demonstrate that that is not founded on fact. The trouble with this question of land in severalty is, that the friends of the measure have adopted the end for the means. They have turned things right around. When an Indian becomes civilized, when he becomes Christianized, when he knows the value of property, and when he knows the value of a home that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] spoke of so eloquently yesterday, then he is prepared to take land in severalty, and then he is prepared not only to take land in severalty, but to take care of the land after he has got it, and to discharge all the duties of citizenship in the highest sense of the term.

It was said here that the Cheyenne River Indians were an example of the benefits of land in severalty. I have gone over and examined the record of the Cheyenne River Indians; I have examined all the cases that were referred to in the Senate last week, and referred to in the letter of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs that was read to the Senate. The Cheyenne River Indians have taken twenty-four allotments of one hundred and sixty acres each, fifty-one allotments of about ten acres each at various localities of the reservation, so that the total number of allotments is seventy-five and the total number of Indians on that reservation is seven hundred and sixty-four. The twenty-four allotments are allotments in the proper sense of the term; the fifty-one allotments are not allotments at all in the ordinary meaning of the term "allotment."

Before I go further I want to call the attention of the Senate to that which seems to be strangely misunderstood by persons outside, and I believe it is misunderstood by the Indian Department. There is a wide difference between holding land in common tenure and working the land in common. Every Indian tribe owns its land and works it in common, with the exception of those here spoken of and a few others, yet they do not work the land in common. The civilized Indians of the Indian Territory hold all their land by a common tenure, and yet they do not work an acre of it in common any more than white men would do under the same circumstances. Each Indian goes upon the reservation and takes for himself such land as is unoccupied and works it, and he works it just as long as he sees fit. That is the rule among all the Indian tribes. That possession of an Indian, that appropriation by him is as sacredly protected and guarded among the Indians as though he owned a fee-simple title; but when he abandons it and goes away from it then any other Indian may step in and take his place. Knowing that fact, and knowing that the Indians protect these possessions with as much scrupulous honesty as we protect the fee-simple title, I say that when it is asserted that they will not work because the title is not secure, it is nonsense. The Indian's title in the Indian Territory is as absolutely certain as if he held the fee, and the only advantage he would have in holding the fee would be that he might dispose of his land. They do not work the fields in common except as an individual may do it or as might be done by white men under like circumstances.

The objection that I have to this system is that it will be compulsory, if it ever becomes a law, upon these Indians, so far as the Department can make it, to accept the land by allotment, to take their land in quarter-sections and in forties and then the rest of the land is to be disposed of. I had some doubt whether that was the intention of the Secretary of the Interior; but after the lucid explanation upon that subject by the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs yesterday there can be no doubt that two things go together, first, the Indian must take the land; next, after having taken so much land as he is entitled to under this bill, the rest of it must be sold and must go into the possession of other people. The honorable chairman yesterday, in stating his objection to the amendment of the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. MORGAN,] said in reply to that Senator:

> Mr. COKE. I take it that under the bill the agreement to be submitted to the Indians whenever they manifest a desire to have their lands allotted in severalty is an entirety, and embraces not only the allotment of the lands in severalty among the Indians, but a negotiation for the remainder of the lands in excess of that allotted for the General Government, the bill anticipating that one portion of the agreement would not be entered into without the other.

That is the theory upon which the bill goes. Then I assume, because the organ of the committee in that particular so asserts, that when the Indians have made the allotment, that will be all the land that is left to them. If the allotment is unwisely made, there will be no remedy. If they get the poor land and the best is left, there will be no remedy.

I started to make this explanation in order to show that the Indians who had taken land in severalty were only a small portion of the Indians, and that no such result had followed as is claimed for the system. I alluded to the Cheyenne River Indians. Now I will call attention to the Devil Lake Indians, who were also mentioned as among the Indians who were demanding land in severalty. I find from an examination of the reports of 1878, 1879, and 1880, that there has been no land in the Devil Lake agency in severalty in the proper sense of the term, or if it has been so taken the evidence is wanting in the reports. They have been allowed to do there just what I claim they ought to be allowed to do everywhere, to go upon the reservation and take any piece of ground that they think is suitable for cultivation and cultivate it. The report shows that they have taken small pieces of ground from two to twenty-five acres, and have cultivated them. There is nothing in the report of 1878 or 1879 or 1880 that justifies any assertion that they have accepted land in severalty or that they are demanding land in severalty.

Then take the Sisseton agency. While they have been allowed for more than ten years to take land in severalty, I find the statement that one Indian has taken a quarter-section of land. I will give the friends of this measure the benefit of that. I have no doubt one Indian has taken a quarter-section of land, but there are fifteen hundred Indians on that reservation who have not suggested that they wanted any land in severalty.

It is stated that the White Earth Indians in Minnesota are desirous that their titles should be secured to them. Every Indian in the United States is desirous that his title should be secured to him. One of the principal troubles that we have met with is because we have not secured to them their title. They know what a paper title from the Government means, and they want the title not to themselves, but to their tribe; they want it where it will be understood that they cannot be disturbed; they want it so that an act of Congress cannot move them without their consent. That is what they mean when they say they want land in severalty.

There was one other class of Indians spoken of, and I want to call attention to them. It was said that the Oneida Indians want land in severalty. I find this in the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs for 1880:

> The Oneidas are well advanced in agriculture, a large portion of their reservation being with propriety called the garden of Brown County. The main settlement, extending nearly the whole length of the reserve, north and south, is one continuous line of large, beautiful farms, with many good, substantial dwellings, barns, granaries, and tool-houses. By their industry they harvest large and profitable crops, and raise (considering the climate and latitude) a good proportion of horses, cattle, hogs, and some sheep. Not having a farmer on this reserve it is impossible for me to give an accurate account of all their productions. Interest in agriculture is steadily and yearly increasing; many new farms are being cleared and cultivated, while many of the old are enlarged and improved. Their continuous cry to the Government is for the allotment of their lands to each individual without being subjected to taxation, sale, or judgment of any court. This would be an incentive to further industry among them.
> They do not want to become citizens, (as heretofore reported,) but claim the protection of the Government for at least twenty-five years in the future, as they deem the liabilities of a citizen fatal to the welfare of many of the most destitute Indians.

I do not doubt that the men who have transformed this wilderness into a garden are sufficiently enlightened and sufficiently civilized to accept title to their lands and to keep them, and that is the only class of Indians who are clamoring for title. It is when they have become civilized, when they have become in effect white men, that they propose to act as white men and accept their title as white men do. But this bill is not for the benefit of that class of Indians. This bill is for all the Indians alike, except the five civilized tribes, as they are called. The civilized and the uncivilized Indians, the semi-civilized and the savage, are all to have the benefits of this bill. If the Secretary of the Interior and the Committee on Indian Affairs are correct, you only have to allot the land in severalty, and that is the end of the whole difficult problem, and the Indians are civilized, Christianized, and enlightened.

The Umatilla Indians, in Oregon, form another of the tribes referred to. I find something about these Indians, and I desire to call attention to it. I read from the same report:

> On the 15th of January, 1880, a council was held for the purpose of taking into consideration any propositions compatible with the agreement entered into by the chiefs (April, 1879,) that would have a tendency to improve the condition of Indians taking land in severalty here. The Most Rev. Charles J. Seghers, archbishop of Oregon, was present, and by his advice and influence aided in harmonizing the deliberations of the council. The following propositions were agreed upon, which the Indians requested me to forward to your office, and, if they meet with the approval of the honorable Secretary of the Interior, to incorporate them into the agreement entered into by the chiefs at Washington last April, before Congress takes final action in their affairs.

These chiefs came here and made an agreement, such as can always be obtained from a lot of Indian chiefs, an agreement of any character almost that the Government sees fit to insist upon. But the Umatilla Indians were not satisfied with that agreement. That provided that they should take land in severalty. They say "we do not want land in severalty" except it may be upon the following conditions:

> First. That the laws of inheritance of the United States be extended over all Indians taking land in severalty on this reservation. Their reason for making the request is, to secure to the rightful heirs the real estate and personal property of deceased Indians, so as to prevent the Indian custom of dividing the property among the friends of the deceased.
> Second. To allow them the privilege to lease land for a term of five years. Many of the Indians are unable to engage in agricultural pursuits on account of old age, sickness, &c., and will derive no revenue from the land unless the right to lease is allowed.

That has been studiously and steadily denied by the Department, and I presume now that the committee would not accept a proposition that would bring this bill within the idea of the Umatilla Indians. I find the agent says further:

> Many of these Indians are still undecided whether to take land on severalty here or remove to some other reservation, and will be guided in their decision by the action of your office on these propositions.

Reference was also made in this discussion to the Peorias and Miamies as being among the Indians who were anxious to have agricultural lands. I find that the Peorias and Miamies number in all two hundred and eighteen, and occupy a delightful reservation of 50,301 acres:

> The greater portion of their land is agricultural, and their reservation is equal in value to that of the Quapaws. The headmen visited Washington last winter in the interest of their people, who are unanimously in favor of allotment of their lands. It is to be hoped that the Department will aid them in this matter, as a large majority are certainly advanced sufficiently for the change, and a delay will only retard and discourage them. This tribe contains some of the most energetic and enterprising men under my charge, and I am in full sympathy with them in accomplishing this their great desire. Taken as a whole, they have succeeded well the past year. They have not erected a great number of new buildings.

I find also in the same report, speaking of the Wyandots:

The Wyandots are the largest tribe under the agency, and number two hundred and fifty, with a reservation of 21,706 acres. The larger portion of it is very poor, and only suitable for grazing. These people embrace the two extremes; some of the most ignorant and intelligent men we do business for. Many of these men are well advanced, and with equal advantages with our own race would soon rank with our best citizens. They are engaged in farming, and some have fine farms and large herds of good cattle; 1,448 acres have been under cultivation by these people, being the best showing of any tribe, and sixty-four of their children attended the mission school, in which all are very much interested.

The Quapaws, the Peorias, and Miamies, and the Wyandots were not among the Indians included with those to have the benefits of this bill until the honorable Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] secured the adoption of his amendment. The Flandreau Sioux were also spoken of. That is probably the very best showing for the friends of this bill. There they have taken up a number of pieces of land voluntarily, and I have no doubt that that was a movement of the Indians themselves. But see what is said of these Indians:

They all wear citizens' clothing, have abandoned their tribal relation, and instead of the old chiefs who held their office for life, the tribe now annually elect by ballot councilors who hold their office for two years. In this way we get a more active and energetic class of men to stand at the head of the tribe. They can plow, plant, and sow their seed, cut, gather, and thrash their grain, without the aid of the white man, but it is not done with the care and rapidity with which the general class of white persons would do it.

There, again, we find that these Indians are civilized. There, I say again, this is the result of their civilization, and an allotment of land in severalty never made these men civilized. They were civilized before they proposed to take the land. That is the theory. Whenever an Indian is civilized you may give him land in severalty; but he will not take it until he is civilized, and the taking of the land, in my judgment, will not civilize him at all. So you may go through all of these so-called examples of the benefits of allotment of land and you will find that the Indians had been civilized upon the land they held in common; that they followed the old tribal relation up to the time that contact with the white man and the influence of schools and missionaries upon them had made them practically civilized, and then they proposed to take their homes as white men do.

The number of Indians who have taken land in severalty is rather small. I have here a little work called The Indian Question, by Hon. Francis A. Walker, formerly Commissioner of Indian Affairs. I believe it will be admitted that whatever leaning he may have upon this subject, whatever bias he may have, is in favor of the Indian. It will hardly be charged that he is a western man in his sympathies, or that he has any of the hostility toward the Indian that is said to exist in the minds of very many people in the West. This book was written immediately after he left the office. He says:

The United States have by recent treaties or legislative enactments admitted to citizenship the following Indians.

Then he enumerates them, amounting in all to about eight thousand, if I recollect.

Time has not yet been given for the full development of the consequences of thus devolving responsibility upon these Indians; but we already have information, official or semi-official, to the effect that the majority of the Pottawatomie citizens—

That is the largest number of them—

after selling their lands in Kansas, have gone to the Indian Territory, and reassociated themselves as a tribe; that of the Wyandots, considerable numbers have attached themselves to the reorganized tribe in the Indian Territory; that of the citizen Ottawas of Blanchard's Fork, nearly all have disposed of their allotted lands, and are still cared for to some extent by the Government as Indians; that of the Ottawas and Chippewas of Michigan, a majority certainly, and probably a large majority, have sold the lands patented to them in severalty, in many cases the negotiation preceding the issue of patents, two parties of white sharpers contesting for the favor of the agent in the way of early information as to the precise lands assigned, and the disappointed faction, in at least one instance, resorting to burglary and larceny for the needed documents.

It will be thus seen, that, of these Indians upon whom the experiment of citizenship has been tried, more than one-half, probably at least two-thirds, are now homeless, and must be re-endowed by the Government or they will sink to a condition of hopeless poverty and misery.

I repeat that whatever civilization to-day exists among the Indians exists by virtue of the communal right to land. There is no particularly noted instance of Indians having progressed except in that line and in that way. Of the civilization of the five tribes the Senate heard yesterday. The honorable Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] spoke of their lawyers, of their courts, of their legislative bodies, and of the character of the people as a people. They are classed everywhere as civilized; yet they have been civilized under adverse circumstances to a very great extent, but occupying all the time land that they held in common.

Take the Indians in the State of New York. In 1847 the State of New York gave to all the Indians within her borders the opportunity by a proceeding of dividing up and partitioning their lands. How many of them have accepted it? A few Oneidas, and only a few, and they are not the best example of the Indians of that State.

Take the Navajoes in the Territory of New Mexico. These Indians reside upon a reservation that they hold in common. I cannot find that any agent from that tribe has ever suggested that they had any idea about land in severalty. That idea has not reached these Indians; and yet they are very nearly self-supporting, having large herds and large crops. The Navajo agency is situated on the immediate border of the State of Colorado, and there are 12,000 Indians all told. They have an area of a little over five million acres of land. They have upon that, as shown by the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, about fifteen thousand acres of arable land, a little more than one acre to each man, woman, and child. It is proposed to divide up that tract of land. It is proposed to give each of them the number of acres provided for in this bill, and as near as it can be estimated it would require about a million and a quarter acres to satisfy the provisions of the bill. Upon that million and a quarter acres these Indians would at once become paupers, although you might include in the million and a quarter acres every acre of available land. But that cannot be done. These Indians have 40,000 head of horses, or three and a third horses to every man, woman, and child. They have 700,000 sheep, or fifty-eight and a half sheep to every man, woman, and child. They have in addition five hundred head of cattle, five hundred mules, and a thousand duros or jacks. They sold last year 800,000 pounds of wool, or sixty-six and three-fourths pounds to every man, woman, and child in the tribe. In addition to that, they manufactured into blankets 100,000 pounds of wool. That is an example of prosperity which cannot be equaled by reference to any tribe holding land in severalty; and that is a degree of prosperity which will be utterly destroyed whenever the system of lands in severalty shall be adopted and applied to that tribe.

I find that a committee of the other House in the Forty-fifth Congress, to whom was referred a bill that had made it proper for them to examine this subject, have gone very carefully into it, and I propose to submit for the benefit of posterity, if for nothing else, the finding of this committee. This is a report upon a bill for the organization of the Territory of Oklahoma, was submitted in the Forty-fifth Congress, and is signed by "HENRY S. NEAL, H. Y. Riddle, H. L. MULDROW, WM. ALDRICH, T. B. REED, G. A. Bagley, and James T. Jones." The report shows great care and an examination of very many documents with reference to the Indians. They say:

There is certainly nothing in these official accounts to justify any violation of treaty stipulations by congressional interference with the governments they describe.

The reports show:

That the tribes who are governed by their own laws in the Indian Territory as a general rule have done better and are now doing better than those out of it who are governed by State laws.

That the tribes who have kept up the tribal organization as a rule have done better than those who have dissolved it.

That the best progress heretofore made by any considerable number of Indians has been made by those who have adhered to the tenure in common, while, on the other hand, the tenure in severalty has in most cases worked badly.

Mr. COKE. What report is that?

Mr. TELLER. It is House report No. 188, Forty-fifth Congress, third session, and is the report of a committee of the House of Representatives. Of course they differ with the Senate committee; but they have not simply gone on and made bald assertions, they have produced here the facts, and if the Senate will listen to them or read them they will see that the weight of evidence, as we say in the courts, is decidedly against this bill, that the trial has been made and failed in more cases by a large majority than it has succeeded. The committee proceed to say:

The plan of making citizens of Indians, with separate titles to their improvements, to be held on the same footing with other citizens, was first officially recommended by Mr. Crawford, while Secretary of War under President Madison, in a report dated March 13, 1816. (2 Indian Affairs, 27.)

The same idea is indicated in the report, heretofore quoted, from Mr. Calhoun, of February 8, 1822, (Ib., 276,) and was incorporated in the treaty made with the Choctaws in 1820, while he had charge of Indian affairs.

During Mr. Adams's administration Secretary Barbour prepared a bill for the organization of an Indian Territory, based on the general principles of excluding whites, abolishing tribal relations, and apportioning lands among individual Indians, upon which great stress was laid.

It was then just as important in the judgment of very many well-meaning people that land in severalty should be given to the Indians as it is to-day, and the same happy results were then prophesied if land was only given to them, that are now predicted.

A leading feature, however, was that nothing was to be done without the consent of the Indians.

Treaties were made in President Jackson's first term with the Choctaws and the Creeks, having emigration for their object, but intending to give each emigrant the privilege of selling his improvement, and to secure to each family desiring to remain, a home with title in fee-simple. (See fourteenth and nineteenth articles Choctaw treaty 1830, and first three articles Creek treaty 1832; 7 Statutes, 335, 336, 366.) Both treaties, in their reservation features, proved to be miserable failures. Large claims are now pending on the Government to make good the injuries sustained by the Indians.

The report from the House Committee on Indian Affairs, No. 663, first session, Twenty-fourth Congress, contains evidence, on page 43 and page 44, (see eighth volume Public Lands,) showing that the agents of the Government actually interfered to prevent the Indians from securing the lands provided for in the treaty. The nature of the difficulties they had to encounter in other respects is also shown on pages 52 and 78 of Senate Document No. 168, first session Twenty-eighth Congress.

The operation of individual reservations under these treaties doubtless caused the plan to be abandoned, as appears from expressions in the supplementary Cherokee treaty of 1835 (7 Statutes, 488,) and the Ottawa and Chippewa treaty of 1836. (Ib., 494.) With one or two exceptions nothing more of it was heard until 1854, when the experiment was renewed on a large scale by Commissioner Manypenny.

Then they give the history of Commissioner Manypenny's treaties:

The history of the Manypenny treaties and of their working throws more light on the subject under consideration than it is possible to obtain from any other source.

I think if the Senate will take the pains to look at this document, or take the pains to look at the statement of this committee, and of which is verified by reference in each case to the authority upon which they make it, it ought to weigh as much as the high sounding declaration that the Indians are demanding lands in severalty and that so much will be accomplished if it is allowed. Speaking now of Manypenny's report, they say:

He says in the annual report for 1853, page 28, that it had always been understood that none but Indians were to occupy that country—

Referring to the country west of the Missouri—and that consequently the Indians were "excited;" that the emigrant Indians "seemed to have a vived recollection of the assurances made to them at the time of their removal, that their present locations should be their permanent homes, and that the white race should never interfere with their possessions." (Page 32.) The Commissioner told them they would do better to sell out and remove to some less exposed place. He adds in his report that "the position of Nebraska, with reference to our Pacific possessions, renders it a matter of vast importance that it be speedily opened and actual settlers invited into it on the most liberal terms."

No treaties were made that year. Out of a large number subsequently negotiated by him, six were with emigrant tribes living in the country previously set apart exclusively for Indians. All of these treaties embody the allotment principle, and one of them provides for the dissolution of tribal relations. Two others with Indians in Michigan contain both features. Of these treaties all but one were made in May and June, 1854. The bill organizing the Territories of Kansas and Nebraska became a law May 30, 1854, and of course an overwhelming stream of settlers began to pour in.

The policy inaugurated by Commissioner Manypenny was followed by his successors. Treaties were made in 1859, with the Sacs and Foxes of Mississippi, and with the "Kansas" Indians, both providing for allotments, and in 1860 a treaty was made with the Delawares, the first of a series which added to the allotment system the new feature of providing for railroads.

In November, 1861, a similar treaty was made with the Pottawatomies, and in June, 1862, one with the Kickapoos.

Now I will call the attention of the Senate to some peculiar things in the report:

The phraseology of these three treaties is peculiar. They all express a conviction on the part of the Indians of the benefits to be derived from railroads in enhancing the value of their lands, and in one case—the Pottawatomies—in carrying the surplus product of their farms to market. Two of the tribes entertain the opinion that the "Leavenworth, Pawnee, and Western" possesses advantages over all other railroad companies. The third "entertains the opinion" that the "Atlantic and Pike's Peak Company" possesses those advantages. All three tribes desire that the companies specified shall have the preference in buying their lands, the Kickapoos and Pottawatomies at $1.25 per acre; the Delawares at an appraisement, which practically amounted to the same thing, 223,966 acres being appraised at $226,742. (Revised Indian Treaties, 351.)

Whether the lands thus secured to railroad companies, and which then as now were considered the best in Kansas, were or were not worth more than $1.25 an acre, the reports do not indicate. But they do show that most of the Indians who prized railroads so highly got out of their way as soon as they could secure homes elsewhere. The three tribes seem to have numbered when the treaties were made about thirty-four hundred. Of these, according to the last report for 1877, less than seven hundred remain in their former homes, the largest proportion being in the smallest band, the Kickapoos. The Delawares went in a body to the Indian Territory, and of the Pottawatomies, the tribe that wanted the means of getting the surplus product of their farms to market, more than three-fourths went to the Indian Territory.

That was the report, I suppose, of the agents that they were crying for a market for their farm produce.

The place marked with their name on the Indian Office map is more than one hundred miles beyond the reach of any railroad. The four hundred and fifty left to enjoy the facilities for getting "the surplus product of their farms to market" are described in the report for 1877 (page 118) as cherishing "prejudices against civilized customs," residing in dwellings made of bark, "generally with an open space in the top for the smoke to escape, and really unfit for occupancy." Out of fifty of their dwellings, the report for 1870 says that thirty-five were bark lodges, and describes them as adhering "tenaciously to ancient Indian customs."

If they had any farm products in 1862 they must have sadly retrograded to 1877.

These are some of the same Indians described in the treaties as desiring to promote civilization by selling part of their land and to increase the value of what they retained by getting a railroad to cross it, and as preferring one particular company, because they believed the construction of its road "is now rendered reasonably certain."

It will be seen a little further on that the working and effect of these treaties has been such as no doubt to add to, if it has not created, a general feeling of hostility to railroads on the part of the Indians affected by them.

One more treaty remains to be mentioned, that of 24th June, 1862, with the Ottawas of Blanchard's Fork and Roche de Bœuf, which was modeled on the Manypenny plan of dissolving tribal relations, and dividing lands in severalty. But before looking into the detailed working of any one case, it may be well to give an idea of the general result as described by Commissioner Manypenny himself, on page 21 of his report, in November, 1856, two years and a half after the date of the first treaty. He says:

"The rage for speculation and the wonderful desire to obtain choice lands cause those who go into our new Territories to lose sight of and entirely overlook the rights of the aboriginal inhabitants. The most dishonorable expedients have in many cases been made use of to dispossess the Indian, demoralizing means employed to obtain his property."

In Kansas, he says:

"Trespasses and depredations of every conceivable kind have been committed on the Indians. They have been personally maltreated, their property stolen, their timber destroyed, their possessions encroached upon, and divers other wrongs and injuries done them."

He speaks of the "disorderly and lawless conduct" of those who, "while they have quarreled about the African, have united upon the soil of Kansas in wrongdoing toward the Indian."

That in this respect history was simply repeating itself, is shown by the account given twenty years earlier by Colonel J. J. Abert, of the United States Army, of his observations among the Creeks, to whom he had been sent on a special mission by the War Department in May, 1833, three years after the laws of Alabama had been extended over them, and thirteen months after the ratification of the treaty assigning a portion of their lands to each family.

This is Colonel Abert's report:

You cannot form an adequate idea of the deterioration which these Indians have undergone during the last two or three years from a general state of comparative plenty to that of unqualified wretchedness and want. * * *

The free ingress into the nation of the whites, encroachments upon their lands, even upon their cultivated fields; abuses of their persons and property; hosts of traders who, like locusts, have devoured their substance, and have inundated their homes with whisky, have destroyed what little disposition to cultivation they may once have had. * * * The corn crop this season will not be sufficient to feed more than one-fourth of them. * * * They are brow-beaten, cowed, and imposed upon, and depressed with the feeling that they have no adequate protection in the United States and no capacity of self-protection in themselves.

They dare not enforce their own laws to preserve order for fear of the laws of the whites; in consequence more murders have been committed in the last six months than for as many previous years. (10 Ind. Rem., 424.)

The committee proceed:

These two accounts, one of Indians in Alabama in 1833, the other of Indians in Kansas in 1856, so strikingly alike in their tenor, come from gentlemen of high character. Colonel Abert was long and favorably known at Washington as the head of the Bureau of Topographical Engineers. Commissioner Manypenny, twenty years after he had left the Indian Bureau, was requested by an Administration to which he was politically opposed to serve as chairman of the commission to negotiate with the hostile Sioux.

For the present it is enough to say that those treaties in their practical application made necessary the changes effected in the treaties of 1866 with the Cherokees, Choctaws, Chickasaws, Creeks, and Seminoles, who then owned all of what is now known as the Indian Territory except about two hundred thousand acres in its northeast corner, and as one of the results of the war were required to cede a portion of it for the benefit of their brethren in Kansas who, as it will be seen, had been brought to the verge of ruin by the system of allotments and the dissolution of their tribal relations.

Practically, there was a repetition in 1866 of what had occurred between 1830 and 1840. Then a country west of the Mississippi had been purchased for Indians living east of that river. In 1866 part of the south half of that region had to be repurchased for Indians living in the north half of it. The limits of the region guaranteed to the emigrant tribes "forever" had already been curtailed, and the object of the treaties of 1866 was to provide for a further curtailment.

Among the fifteen tribes visited by Commissioner Manypenny in 1853 there was one, the Wyandots, who, in case a Territory was organized, wanted to change their system, and "conform to the new order of things." In January, 1855, they made a treaty, which declares them sufficiently advanced in civilization, and that "being desirous of becoming citizens, their relations as an Indian tribe shall be dissolved and terminated," except so far as their continuance may be necessary for certain purposes, and such of the Indians as might desire it were to continue on a tribal footing. Those who wished it were to be citizens. Their lands were to be divided. Those who were able to take care of themselves were to receive patents in fee-simple. In other cases lands were to be inalienable for five years; and after that, could be sold only with the consent of the President.

It is doubtful whether any better subjects could have been selected for such an experiment. As far back as 1809 their progress in agriculture had attracted attention. (Morse's Report on Indian Affairs, appendix, page 16.)

Mr. Calhoun, in a report to Congress January 15, 1820, places them in the front rank among Indians who had made advances in civilization. (2 Ind. Affs., 200.) and Judge Burnet, in his "Notes on the early settlement of the Northwest," speaks from personal observation of their rapid advances in civilization from 1821 to 1828. (Pages 386, 387.)

But the experiment was a signal failure. The treaty was proclaimed March 1, 1855. Eleven years afterward a special agent was employed to investigate their affairs, whose statement appears in the annual report of the Indian Office for 1866. He says:

"By far the larger part of the Wyandots prefer to continue the tribal organization, have long been absent from the lands patented to them, and are living in the Indian Territory. Many others who have lived and acted as citizens desire to return to the tribal state outside of the encroachment of white settlers. No matter how much they may try to live like white people, the whites think Indians have no rights white men are bound to respect. They are constantly robbed of stock and other property," &c. (Page 254.)

He adds that both the citizen and Indian parties wish to remove to the Indian Territory, and that those constituting the "Indian party" claim to be the tribe, and insist that the Government should ignore the others. (Page 254.)

In February, 1867, a treaty was made which, after stating that some of the Wyandots, having sold their land, are still poor and that others had become citizens who were not fitted for the responsibility of citizenship, proceeds in the thirteenth article to provide a home for them to be held "in common," and for a registration "which shall show the names of all who desire to be and remain Indians and in a tribal condition." (Revision of Indian Treaties, 840, 844.)

According to prevailing opinions and theories this was a step backward, and ought to have had an injurious effect. Practically it worked precisely the other way.

The annual reports from 1871 to 1877 show a steady and continuous improvement resulting from restoration to the tribal condition and tenure in common.

In the report for 1871, on page 499, they are described as "now a tribe, having recently completed a reorganization." Superintendent Hoag, on page 461, alludes to the "condition of poverty, ignorance, and demoralization into which it has been so unfortunately thrown." He says: "The present faction holding tribal authority are incapable of making advancement to a better condition. Having neither funds, credit, nor force, it is left for them to say whether their brethren who were unconsciously and unwillingly made citizens shall be reinstated as members of the tribe."

In 1872 the Commissioner says, on page 39, they are poor and making slight progress.

In 1873, they "have had a year of prosperity and have made considerable improvement in their farms and buildings; have kept the greater portion of their children in school." (Page 213.)

In 1874, page 229, they "have been earnest in their efforts to improve their condition."

In 1875, they "are steady, industrious, and progressive, engaged in agriculture, and have raised crops sufficient for their subsistence." (Page 101.)

In 1876, they are "in a very fair condition;" take great interest in education; as well disposed as the average whites in the adjoining settlements; have "good farms, and are improving financially." (Page 57.)

In 1877, "they are as a rule enterprising and energetic. All are engaged in farming, some of them having fine, large farms, with all the conveniences of civilized life about them." They "number about two hundred and fifty," and "have had sixty-five of their children in school during the year." (Page 103.)

The foregoing details are given because they show beyond all doubt that it is a mistake to assert that the tribal condition with lands held in common is unfavorable to improvement.

There are other facts relating to this tribe worthy of serious attention.

The report for 1855 shows that on the pay-roll for 1854 there were five hundred and fifty-four Wyandots.

Commissioner Walker says, in 1872, (page 38,) "they number at present two hundred and twenty-two souls. Ten years ago they were four hundred and thirty-five."

Thus, in 1862, seven years after they were made citizens and their lands were divided, the reduction in their number was one hundred and nineteen—more than one-fifth, and this reduced number sustained a further reduction during the next ten years of nearly one-half.

On the other hand, from 1872 up to 1877, the reports show a small increase, last fall's statistical table indicating two hundred and forty-six against two hundred and twenty-two in 1872.

The Wyandottes are the very Indians proclaimed by the friends of this bill to be now clamoring for lands in severalty. They tried it for twenty years and they voluntarily abandoned it. Having severed their tribal connection they then reorganized it. We are now asked to believe notwithstanding their present prosperous condition that they are all at once willing and anxious to come back to that which proved such an entire and disastrous failure. The testimony is not worth being considered; it is not reliable; it does not come here in any such way that we are required to give it credence or belief in any shape whatever. It is not reasonable, and it is not true. The Wyandottes in 1880 produced 10,600 bushels corn, 7,430 bushels of wheat, and of oats and barley 1,166 bushels, of vegetables 823 bushels, hay 260 tons; and they are all living in houses of which there are 152.

I do not propose to read the entire report. The same state of facts substantially existed with reference to very many other Indians, some of which are cited here. The Peorias and Miamies have been cited here as another evidence of the universal demand of the Indians for land in severalty:

The Peorias and Miamies were also provided with homes in the country of the Senecas and Shawnees by the treaty of 1867.

Both tribes in 1854 had consented to a partition of their lands, and both had become considerably reduced in numbers. The Peorias removed to the Indian Territory soon after the treaty of 1867, and are described by the Commissioner in 1872 as intelligent, well advanced in civilization, and successful in raising crops, (p. 38.) The Miamies then still in Kansas on their allotments are said, on page 32 of the same report, to be "greatly demoralized, their school has been abandoned, and their youth left destitute of educational advantages."

Let me repeat it again. The Indians who have remained upon the land, who have gone upon the land in common and are cultivating it in accordance with Indian theology, with Indian law, and with the principles of Indian political economy, are advaneing, progressing, while the Indians who remained on their allotments, says the Commissioner, are "greatly demoralized, their school has been abandoned, and their youth left destitute of educational advantages."

I find in this report an item that I think is worthy of the attention of the Senate. Says the committee:

One fact in connection with Miami lands which is stated on pages 144 and 145 of the report for 1874 is worthy of notice.

I call attention to that because the chairman of the committee in charge of the bill declares that the two propositions go hand in hand to allot the land, and then to sell the remainder and apply it for the use of the Indians. There is the same provision in the act of 1854 with reference to these Peorias and Miamies.

A portion of them, amounting to 2,493 acres, were advertised for sale by order of the Secretary of the Interior on the 4th November, 1873; one hundred and sixty-five acres were sold, for which the amount received was $1,823.56, from which of course was deducted the expense incurred in advertising. By a curious coincidence the cost of advertising amounted to precisely the same sum! The land brought $1,823.56 and the advertising bills were $1,823.56.

Then he adds that one hundred and sixty-five acres were sold simply to pay for the advertising.

In March, 1873, an act was passed to abolish the tribal relations of the Miamies, under which separate lists were to be made on the one hand of those who wished to become citizens, and on the other hand of those desiring to join the Peorias in the Indian Territory. Under that act, out of the remnant of one hundred and six representing the five hundred Miamies who emigrated in 1846, thirty-four became citizens, and seventy-two were placed on the Indian list to join the "United Peorias and Miamies."

"The good effect of this consolidation," says their agent in 1877, "has been seen in the energy with which they have been engaged in enlarging old and making new improvements. * * * They have good houses and barns, and many large farms well stocked with cattle, horses, and hogs. Their children have attended school with regularity, the attendance aggregating eighty-seven" out of a population of two hundred and two. (Page 103.)

I do not desire to weary the Senate, but there is another case or two here which I desire to notice, as I believe it will be instructive if Senators will give proper attention to it. The committee say:

But of all the experiments in citizenship and tenure in severalty, the one which is on the whole the most instructive is that tried upon the Pottawatomies, as for a while it promised to be eminently successful.

Their treaty of November 15, 1861, before referred to as providing for a sale to a railroad company, assigned land in severalty to those desiring it, while others were to hold, as before, in common. Those who received patents might at the same time become citizens. In February, 1867, another treaty was made, looking to homes in the Indian Territory, and requiring a registration of those desiring to go to the new reservation and of those wishing to remain and become citizens. Under that provision more than three-fourths of them did become citizens, not all at once, but gradually. Of the first six hundred who had thus registered, the report for 1868 says, on page 255, that they "comprise the most industrious and intelligent of the tribe, and will make useful and respected citizens."

The report for 1869 (page 33) speaks of the same Indians as "well educated and successful farmers."

In 1870 (page 275) "a large number of those who have received land in severalty are proving themselves worthy of the high trust." They have "large cultivated fields, fine dwellings, and numerous herds of improved stocks of cattle, horses, hogs, &c., all bearing testimony to the wisdom of their choice."

In 1871 the accounts begin to change—speak of many of them as "good citizens, with large, fine stone and frame buildings for residences, barns and granaries, and some of the best fences around their fields; * * * many of them men of influence in Church and State."

The agent adds, however:

"I regret to say that this is not the case with quite a large number of those who have thrown off their tribal relations. They now declare their act in becoming citizens to have been premature; in their sober moments say they were intoxicated with the idea of becoming citizens. They have squandered their land and money in gambling, drinking whisky, and other evil habits, and are now thrown upon their own resources as poor as the poorest." (Page 496.)

Superintendent Hoag, on page 460 of the same report, says of them that—

"A few have borne the change well and are prosperous; unfortunately a much larger proportion have retrograded into intemperance and poverty. The policy of allowing Indians to become citizens in the midst of white people is ruinous to the former, and should no longer be pursued. They are not usually able to withstand the corrupting influences which are thrown around them by designing and dishonest men, who cling to them like leeches until they have possessed themselves of all their property, and then abandon them to the charge of public or private charity."

The report of 1875 (page 80) says that about fourteen hundred became citizens. "After having received and squandered their share of bountiful tribal funds they take refuge from white competition and taxes alongside their Sac and Fox brethren" on the Indian Territory.

Commissioner J. Q. Smith (page 25, report for 1876) speaks of "the Pottawatomies, who, after becoming citizens, squandered their substance, and have now returned as Indians dependent upon the bounty of the Government."

A letter from the Indian Office, dated January 14, 1878, to the Secretary of the Interior, states that "there are now 1,600 Pottawatomies, who have become citizens of the United States, residing in the Indian Territory," under an act approved May 23, 1872, providing that they shall neither acquire nor exercise, under the laws of the United States, any rights or privileges in the Indian Territory other than those enjoyed by the members of the Indian tribes lawfully residing therein.

Of the Pottawatomies who have thus gone back to the Indian Territory on the footing of Indians, giving up their privileges as citizens, Commissioner Walker says, on page 39 of the report for 1872, "most, if not all of them, are capable of taking care of themselves, and many of them are well educated, intelligent, and thrifty farmers."

Here are well-educated, intelligent, and thrifty Indians who abandoned the severalty system and went back to land in common according to Indian notions.

DELAWARES.

This description seems to apply pretty generally to the Indians who declined to avail themselves of the privileges of citizenship. Out of over one thousand Delawares having that right according to Commissioner Walker, (Ind. Question, page 140,) only twenty used it, the rest, numbering 1,005, (Report for 1869, page 375,) settled among the Cherokees as members of that tribe in 1869. The Cherokee agent says of them, on page 232 of the report for 1872, that "they are among our most industrious and enterprising citizens. Some of them are opening very large farms and setting out orchards, and surrounding themselves with fine herds of horses and cattle." "They are now just finishing a beautiful house of worship. It is small, but will excel any house of worship in this nation as to style and general appearance. They have the means to pay for it already contributed by themselves. They are also taking great interest in personal religion and in education."

* * * * * * *

No one will pretend that such men are not competent to decide for themselves whether the tribal relation or citizenship is best suited to their wants, and whether or not their "very large farms" are sufficiently secure under the Indian title.

The same remark applies to various other tribes that preferred the Indian tenure, particularly to the Ottawas, who, as it has already been shown, were sufficiently intelligent to make extensive appropriations for education, and, after securing the privileges of citizenship voluntarily abandoned them.

The Wyandots, who returned from citizenship and severalty to their former tribal condition, are described in the reports, particularly in those for 1872 and 1875, as superior to the rest of their people in energy and intelligence.

Mr. President, the same thing may be said of all the Kickapoos of Kansas as has been said of these other tribes. After receiving land in severalty the semi-civilized Indians, and some of them civilized, abandoned their land in severalty and took up their line of march and went where they could occupy and hold land in common with other Indians, and upon those lands they have made homes and they have made farms far superior in character to any they ever made upon their allotted lands, and as you go west through the State of Kansas to-day from the old Kickapoo reservation you find an unoccupied and uncultivated country. Why? Because this land was given to these Indians in severalty years ago, and yet they have abandoned it and gone off somewhere else and the land remains unoccupied and useless.

The Sacs and Foxes of the Mississippi also received land in severalty under the treaty of 1859, and they ultimately abandoned their land in severalty and took land in common.

Now I want to call the attention of the Senate to the Michigan Indians because there the effort to civilize Indians by giving them land in severalty has had a full opportunity of showing whether it was a success. These Indians had lived upon the borders of the settlements for many years. They were agricultural Indians. They never had been nomads at any time in their history. They were the dwellers in houses and in villages, occupying their land according to the Indian custom in common. The Government went to work and divided it, and gave to these Michigan Indians, amounting to six or eight thousand in number, their land in severalty. It is shown by the report that while for a few years they did well, they have almost entirely abandoned those lands allotted to them in severalty. As fast as the time expired during which they were prevented from selling the land, they turned around and sold it, and they are now making baskets and picking berries and fishing and hunting and living as only the poorest and lowest people of any country can.

There are several other Indians whom I might mention, but as I have enumerated those with whom this experiment failed, I will not fail to mention those where the allotting of land in severalty seems to have worked well. I shall be fair with the friends of this bill on this subject. There are some Indians in Wisconsin called the Brothertown Indians, and they petitioned the Government for land in severalty and received it, and in that case it seems to have worked well; but when they filed their petition to the Government for this land they said, "We have been agricultural Indians for one hundred and fifty years." It is a little bit of a band of Indians that went from New England, and they have succeeded in maintaining their title, and have progressed instead of retrograding. But the Stockbridges, who, under favorable circumstances, received their lands in the same way, have retrograded, and in almost every case that they could have sold their lands.

I have skipped a good deal that this committee have said, and I would suggest if any Senator wants to see a fair statement of the case with all the evidence on both sides, he should examine this report. Among the conclusions to which the committee came were these:

5. That while official recommendations, some of them entitled to the highest respect, are strongly in favor of making Indians citizens of the United States, and transferring their land titles from the national tenure in common to the individual tenure in severalty, experience has shown that in the great majority of cases such measures, instead of benefiting, have proved injurious to the Indian.

6. That experience fully demonstrates that the holding their lands in common by the Indian tribes is an effectual safeguard against the worst effects of Indian improvidence. Apart from any considerations of justice or humanity it would be unwise and unstatesmanlike to adopt measures which, by destroying that safeguard, would be calculated to reduce the great mass of them, in opposition to their own earnest protests, to a state of hopeless penury and degradation.

Mr. President, it was said here the other day that this system had worked well with reference to the Ute Indians of Colorado. I will admit that there has not been sufficient time to say whether the feature of land in severalty is a desirable one so far as those Indians are concerned or not, but it certainly has not done them any good. It is possible that it may in the future; yet the condition of the affairs in Colorado with reference to the Indians has not been such as to justify the statement made here that the bill has been a success. What would have been the condition of Colorado during the last summer but for the United States troops? There would have been open and flagrant war, as everybody knows, but for the presence of several companies of cavalry at the Los Pinos agency, and at other points in the State. The whole community were excited, both whites and Indians, and nobody familiar with the country can pretend that to-day there is such a condition of affairs there as will justify the Government in leaving those Indians—whether the Government has reference to the preservation of the Indians or the whites is immaterial—without troops in their vicinity. It cannot be said with any show of reason that it has been a success there. That is yet to be demonstrated.

I do not propose to offer any factious opposition to this bill. I assume, and I think I have proved by the references I have made, that all the assertions that this system will work well for the Indians are denied by the naked facts, denied by the experience in this very direction. We have tried it and we have failed, and we have tried it upon the best class of Indians in the United States, and after years of trial upon this question we have found the Indians in a worse condition than when we began. I assert now that there is not a single case where they have bettered their condition by taking land in severalty. If they have held their own, if they have improved at all—and the only case I can find is that of the Brotherton Indians—it is because they were civilized when they took it; but in the majority of cases that I have found they have not stood still, but have gone backward, and all the advancement made to-day and that has been made at any time by Indians in the United States has been made under the system of holding land in common.

I objected the other day and I object now that, if this system is advocated by the friends of the Indians, it is not in their interest. It is not in their interest that the land should thus be divided, and that ultimately, although it may be twenty-five years from now, they should have an opportunity of parting with their title. Why, Mr. President, twenty-five years is but a little time; it will soon come, and the Indian who gets his title this year and in 1905 is entitled to dispose of his land, will be morally certain to dispose of it to the first white man that comes along and offers him anything at all for it. What will become of the Indian when he has parted thus with his title? Who will take care of him? By that time the available and valuable land in the United States will be appropriated. The result will be that the Indians will be as we have found in some sections of the country; divided into little bands straggling through the community, living by stealing and pilfering and begging and other methods that are not reputable. That is the way they will live, and in a few years the whole race will be extinguished. I know a great many people in the United States who have given care and attention to this subject assert that that is the ultimate lot of the Indian, that no effort we can make will save him; but I doubt that. I believe an intelligent effort to save the Indians, civilize and enlighten them, will ultimately do that; but you cannot do it by enactments of law, you cannot do it by asserting that because they have lived upon a piece of land they are civilized; you must take them and put them in some fixed place—as I said to the Senator from Kansas last session in response to his inquiry—make them cultivators of the soil as soon as that can be done, having due regard to their prejudices and their preferences.

First, if possible, make them herdsmen, and then make them cultivators of the soil; violate no prejudice of theirs unless it be absolutely essential for their preservation and for their good; treat them as Indians and not as civilized intelligent beings, which they are not; restrain their ferocity, keep them from committing depredations upon anybody, either white or red; deprive them of the means, if they are nomads, of traveling over the country; keep them in one place; furnish them farmers and furnish them teachers; and there is where you must commence the work of education for the Indian, not at Carlisle, not at Hampton, not at a distant place, but at their homes in their midst. With the many thousand Indian children that are now unprovided for it is impossible to educate them in the East. The school must be established right there on the ground, and it cannot be established so well if the Indians are scattered over a great area of country as they must be if they take these large tracts of land; adopt the colony system as adopted by many colonies that have gone into the West; give each Indian a little piece of ground big enough for him to live upon, big enough for him to cultivate, and give him on its borders pasture for his herds and his flocks; let the Government put there its agent, and he ought to be a skilled man and he ought to be an intelligent and good man, and give him a fair salary, and furnish them seed and tools with which to cultivate the soil, and in a few years, in my judgment, this problem will be settled. It will not be settled by any method of the kind proposed in this bill.

I know that it will take a good deal of money, but I have never believed it was the duty of Government to economize in this particular. I believe it to be the interest of the Government to give the Indians plenty wherewith to advance themselves in civilization, and at the same time make them understand that they must be as soon as possible self-supporting. I would not do as was done last session when you passed the Ute bill. I would not put in a provision that these Indians should be supported by the Government until such time as they chose to support themselves. I would have no such folly as that incorporated in a bill. I would say to them, "in the very near future you must rely upon yourselves," and I would treat them just exactly as an honest man would treat his boy who was not quite up mentally to his other children. I would foster him and protect him and guard him, and I would keep away from him the baneful influences of civilization, and I would surround him with all that is good and valuable in civilized life. When you put them upon these lands you have taken away the power of Government to protect them against their greatest enemy, the use of strong drink. The tribal relations will be practically dissolved whenever the land is allotted, and that is what the Commissioner says in his report for 1880. With this allotment comes a dissolution of the tribal relation. They will not have both; they will not have the land allotted and the tribal relation maintained. That is not the theory of this bill.

I said before, and I say it in no unkind spirit, the bill ought to be entitled a bill to despoil the Indians of their lands and make them vagabonds on the earth, and a few years will demonstrate that what has been true heretofore with Indians will be true hereafter, and no matter who fills the office of Secretary of the Interior, no matter who fills the office of Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and no matter who presides over the Committee on Indian Affairs, how great or how good they may be, they cannot escape the inexorable fact that this has been contrary to the interest of the Indian and contrary to the interest of the white man whenever it has been adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.] He proposes a verbal change in that amendment by adding after the word "and" the word "they;" so as to read:

And they are hereby declared to have become citizens of the United States and entitled as such to the full protection of the Constitution and laws.

The question being put, a division was called for.

Mr. TELLER. Let us have the yeas and nays. That will bring in Senators.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HOAR, (when Mr. BROWN'S name was called.) The Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] is obliged to be out at the other end of the Capitol on business. He would vote for the amendment if he were present. He is paired with the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS.]

Mr. INGALLS, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. BROWN.]

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 12, nays 29; as follows:

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PLUMB. I move to amend section 5 by inserting after the word "void" in line 15 the following:

And provided further, That the lands so allotted may be leased for such term and on such conditions as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior.

I think the committee will not seriously oppose this amendment.

Mr. COKE. I have to say in reply to the Senator from Kansas that I will represent myself upon that question. I intended to favor the proposition, and I reserved the right to consider it when the bill was reported by the committee.

Mr. PLUMB. If the amendment be adopted, I shall move to strike out the word "lease" in line 6.

This bill prohibits the Indian from alienating or encumbering or leasing—using all these words in the prohibitory clause—the lands which they may acquire by reason of this bill. I understand the theory of this bill to be to make the condition of the Indians self-supporting, but it is not of any consequence, I think, in considering this question whether the Indian becomes self-supporting by reason of his own labor or by the use of the property which may be conveyed to him through the medium of this bill. There are now a large number of Indians, or a very considerable number, in the Indian Territory adjoining the southern boundary of the State of Kansas, who, under the consent of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs or the Secretary of the Interior, are leasing their lands to white men, who are farming them. That has two results. In the first place, it gives to the Indian an ample support; and, next, it gives to the white man an equally ample support, which he is willing to accept. It besides results in cultivating just that much more land than otherwise would be cultivated.

Now you give to the Indian by the provisions of this bill quite a considerable body of land, more I think than any one, be he ever so enthusiastic about the results which are to follow this bill, believes that the Indian will ever cultivate or make any considerable use of. It is desirable on all accounts that the land thus to be given to the Indians may be cultivated. If the Indian will not cultivate it what is the objection to leasing it to some white man, under proper restrictions, who will cultivate it, and not only cultivate enough for his own support, but enough for the support of the Indian as well? I think, under the restriction that leases of this kind shall be subject to the inspection and approval of the Secretary of the Interior, not only could no evil result to the Indian, but there might be not merely great good to the Indian, but great good to the community in which this land may be located.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I really am at a loss to understand what is the theory upon which this bill is to be supported at all if there is anything sound in the proposition of the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. PLUMB.] I had an impression that this was a measure the purpose of which was to induce the Indian to cultivate the soil and get some interest in the soil that would induce him to become a cultivator of it, and to derive all the incidental advantages in the progress of civilization which come from industry rewarded. Now it is proposed to allot this land to the Indians, to be inalienable for twenty-five years. He can, however, I suppose, sell the reversion, and now, by this amendment, he can lease the premises, and he can do it with this beneficial result to the Indian, as stated by the Senator from Kansas: it will furnish employment for the white man and food for the Indian without employment! The Indians can devote themselves exclusively to that process of deterioration, to that process of vanishing out of sight, undisturbed, without any such malign influences as come from labor and the gathering of the fruit of the soil, and having something which a man may call his own because he earned it, because he raised it, and because he acquired just that title to it which the white man has. Instead of that the Indian is, on the other hand, furnished by this process of the Senator from Kansas with the aristocratic position of landlord. He is to be the landholder of that region where these reservations exist. He is to have a tenancy under him, and he is to take and consume or waste, or what is more likely drink, the result of other men's labor, without any toil on his part, and without any trouble about growth in grace or in the material interests which are so likely to follow and so unlikely to exist without employing that industry which comes from planting him on the soil and holding out to him some inducement to work. The Indian will be an Indian as long as he lives unless he is taught to work.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. DAWES. Yes, sir.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I telegraphed the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] at his residence this morning asking him to pair with me until I could come into the Senate. One of the pages came to me a while ago and told me they were calling the yeas and nays, and I came into the Chamber and voted, supposing he was here. I voted on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.] I find that the Senator from Vermont was not here, and did not vote; and I ask unanimous consent that I may withdraw my vote, as the result will not thereby be changed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] asks unanimous consent to withdraw his vote cast on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.] If there be no objection it will be so ordered. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, nothing could be so bad for the white man as not to have land to till and cultivate. It would be the worst possible calamity to him I admit, and I would do nothing to deprive him of the opportunity of having it, but at present there is a great deal of uncultivated and unoccupied land in the western country that he can take up and cultivate and derive all the benefits that are certain to flow from a tiller of the soil having some interest in the soil which he cultivates; but what sort of a class of people does the Senator from Kansas expect that he is gathering in any community made up simply of tenants of the Indians, white people having no interest in the soil themselves but simply tenants of Indians, cultivating the soil as lessees of Indians? Nothing could be so damaging to his own State or any other State as a policy that would build up such a society as that. It would be better not to do anything in the line of this bill allotting lands to Indians than in doing it to authorize the Indians to lease those lands to white men. It would be the worst possible thing for the white man as well as for the Indian.

I have a great deal of difficulty in coming to the conclusion that this measure is so perfected that it will do the Indian much good, but I am disposed to go with the committee just as far as I can go with them, though I do not believe their measure entirely perfect, but as being an advance in the direction in which something can be made out of the Indian, and made out of the Indian by teaching him the first elements of civilization, the first ideas that come to the savage in emerging from a state of barbarism into civilization. It is a consciousness of owning something which he has earned himself, and to which he has the highest of all titles that can be conferred, namely, that which results from the fact that he earned it with his own hands. Instead of that the Senator from Kansas in a desire, and a proper desire I have no doubt, to see to it that there is no idle white community about these Indians, suggests that the Indian may, under the approval and approbation of somebody who happens for the time being to occupy one of the three-story marble buildings in this city, knowing as little about the Indian character and what is necessary for their protection and civilization as we do in the East, to say the least, lease all this land, accompanying it with, for aught I see in this bill, with the power to sell the reversion to-day and lease the present estate to-morrow to the purchaser of the reversion. I think the amendment of the Senator from Kansas, if it should prevail, would utterly destroy the bill and make it worse than nothing.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, I am not called on to champion this bill. There are a great many features in it that I think ought to be amended; I think this is one of them, and yet I will add that the fact that I have seen the Indians, and especially the fact that I live west of the Mississippi River, to a certain extent disqualifies me from really saying anything that shall have any authority on this subject whatever. I realize fully that the men who never have seen an Indian, whose ancestors, like those of the Senator from Massachusetts, removed them from the soil that they landed on, are the only men who ought to be able to say anything about this subject; but for the purpose of illustrating the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts about this planting question, I will read an extract from Mr. Palfrey's History of Colonial New England, to show the way the Indians were planted in that model commonwealth. On page 23, volume 3, Mr. Palfrey says:

> The number of Indians remaining within the closely settled portions of New England—

This was in 1685—

> was not now considerable enough to require any special precautions against disaffection which might arise among them. Four years before the revolution, Governor Hinckley estimated their number, including all ages, in Plymouth, where they were much more numerous than in the other colonies, at less than six thousand. Thirteen years later it was believed that in Massachusetts proper there were not many more than two hundred. These were all reckoned among praying Indians— > though experience had shown that in respect to security for their harmlessness their small numbers were to be more regarded than their religious profession.

The italics are those of the author, not mine—

In other words, it was a question more of quantity than of quality. In thirteen years, under the planting process inaugurated by the ancestors of the Senator from Massachusetts, who now is au fait on this Indian question, and who knows all about it, and who is entirely competent to tell what the people who are in contact with the Indians ought to do, and how their conduct in regard to them ought to be controlled and regulated—under such auspices, I say, in thirteen years the Indians of Massachusetts Colony declined from six thousand to about two hundred, planted, to use the expression of the Senator from Massachusetts, planted in the soil. That is where they are.

This is a bill which, if it is to be passed, is of some interest to the people in the West. We are to live in contact with these Indians, and with the estates that are to be created by this bill. We give to these people land in fee, to which they are not now entitled. They are now, by common consent, and by the decisions of our courts, entitled only to the possession of the soil; we propose to give to them the fee of the land allotted to them individually, and to sell the remainder of their reservations for their benefit, and we reserve to the individual Indian a great deal more than the United States to-day permits any white man to reserve out of the public domain for his purposes. Take, for instance, the State of Kansas, the State of Nebraska, the State of Nevada, or any of the Western States in which Indian reservations exist——

Mr. HOAR. Will my friend from Kansas allow me, before he goes further, to point out a mistake which he made in quoting from this book?

Mr. PLUMB. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator undertook to read from Palfrey's History of Colonial New England this extraordinary statement which

I think every Senator understood to mean as I did, that at one time there were six thousand Indians in Massachusetts and thirteen years later there were but two hundred. There are many more than two hundred now. Dr. Palfrey says that in Plymouth, which was originally a separate colony "four years before the Revolution * * * they [the Indians] were much more numerous than in the other colonies;" they were estimated "at less than six thousand. Thirteen years later it was believed that in Massachusetts proper"— which is a totally different territory and has nothing whatever to do with the territory where the six thousand were, another authority thought—"in Massachusetts proper there were not many more than two hundred." "Massachusetts proper" embraced the only considerably settled counties at that time, being Suffolk, Norfolk, and a few others in that vicinity. In other words, the two hundred and the six thousand are estimated by different authorities and relate to totally different tracts of land.

Mr. PLUMB. The difference between the Senator from Massachusetts and myself, then, is one of degree.

Mr. HOAR. It is just as if Dr. Palfrey to-day had said, "I think there are 5,000 Indians in Kansas," and five years later another gentleman said "there are two hundred in New Hampshire."

Mr. PLUMB. The difference between the Senator from Massachusetts and myself, then, is one of degree, and not of kind. If he will tell me what became of the Narragansetts and Pequods who inhabited that colony when, not the people who were born on Massachusetts soil but who landed there and consequently had no right there, first put in an appearance, I will then consider the question as to whether they disposed of them in thirteen years or fifty years.

Mr. HOAR. There is not any difference between my friend from Kansas and myself. I have taken no part in any debate with him which suggested any difference of opinion with him. The honorable Senator from Kansas read a passage from Dr. Palfrey's history which stated that in one tract of country at one time there were less than about six thousand Indians, and at another time, in a different tract altogether, somebody else thought there were not many more than two hundred. He understood the statement of the author to apply to the same tract, to what now passes by the name of Massachusetts, and I simply wished to know whether he would desire to have that mistake go into the RECORD, and I rose to call his attention to what the author really said. Now, I do not want to tell the Senator what has become of the Pequods or Narragansetts without some occasion to go into that chapter of history, which I do not at present see, and I do not undertake to mingle in this debate at all. I made a correction just as I should have made it if the gentleman had mistakenly read from the census that there were three million inhabitants in Massachusetts when in fact there were but one million three hundred thousand. It is the mere fact to which I called his attention and it was not an argument.

Mr. PLUMB. This does not at all divert me from the point I had in view. My attention was directed to it originally in view of the discussion which ensued a few mornings ago, in which the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] undertook to exalt a certain person for that he had succeeded in converting a certain number of Indians, and I simply turned down the leaf for the purpose of being able to bring the attention of the Senate to the fact that there were prayerful Indians a couple of hundred years ago on the American continent, and to show that the Indians of Saint Augustine, to whom the Senator from Vermont referred, were not the only Indians who had given way to the influences of civilization and of prayer, and to notice the comment also of the historian who said he thought on the whole the security of the white settlers surrounding the Indians resulted a great deal more from the fact that they were small in numbers than that they had got religion. If I have mistaken the boundaries of some of the New England colonies or provinces, and so have been mistaken as to where it was that the six thousand Indians disappeared, or, in the language of the senior Senator from Massachusetts, were planted in the sod, I consent to that correction. The fact remains, however, that the communities from which the Indian has been eliminated by processes of violence, of war, of robbery, as they are characterized now, are the communities that send men here to say what shall be done with the remainder of the Indians, who say to us people who know them as they are now, who are brought in contact with them, and who have interests growing out of their interests and out of that contract, what shall be done with the remainder of the Indians upon this continent.

Mr. President, I can submit to that. The bill which is before the Senate to-day, which is the sum of the wisdom of all these people upon this question, might well be entitled in its present condition to be a bill to exterminate the Indians now living upon the North American continent. Talk about inhumanity! This bill in its substance is the essence of inhumanity. I do not complain, because I stand here to-day charged with and supposed to be in favor of all things that are inhuman to Indians; but this measure is the flower of that civilization which has set itself to prescribe some rule for Indian conduct and for white conduct in regard to Indians hereafter which shall be in bright contradistinction from anything which has preceded it.

To come back to the text of this amendment, there will be in the States of Kansas and Nebraska, and in the States to be formed out of the Territory of Dakota and the Indian Territory, large tracts of land which will be, comparatively speaking, under the blight of Indian occupancy. These Indians will have more land per capita than any similar number of white men within the limits of those States respectively. The amendment which I propose simply provides that the Indians may, if they see fit, under the control and in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, lease these lands, not necessarily to white men, although more naturally and obviously to those than to Indians, but to any one who may desire to cultivate them, in such portion, or all of them, as they themselves do not desire to cultivate. I hold that practically there is no right in land except the right to cultivate it. There ought to be no property in land except such as goes along with the ability to cultivate it; and yet we are constituting here these Indians a landed aristocracy, giving them more land than the average of the fifty millions of American people have or can possibly have. We are providing that they in their shiftlessness and in their thriftlessness may leave all its treasures undeveloped, that everything that lies in the soil shall be not only not developed but they shall sit down upon it, and for purposes of their own and against the interest of the communities in which they live, and against their own interest, they shall not only not take out themselves the riches of the soil, but shall not permit anybody else to take them out. I say that that is legislating not only against the interest of the Indians but against the interest of the communities by which they are to be surrounded.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] would have us believe that there is no white man of any respectability or entitled to any respectful consideration here who would rent land from an Indian. If this bill is to be carried out the time may come when very good white people will be glad to have land that an Indian only has, and which he, as opposed to all the other people of the United States, holds not subject to alienation and not subject to taxation. You make him a landed aristocrat. I am not objecting to that now; but you make him besides the holder of lands which, by reason of their non-cultivation, stand in the way of the progress of the communities in which they are located, a bar to their progress, and a constant source of irritation and discontent. Year after year you will find men coming here to complain that the Congress of the United States by improvident legislation has put this bar in the way of the progress of the communities in which these lands are located.

In fact, as I said, there are to-day lands which Indians do not own, but which they occupy as reservations, which are subject to leases of this very character. The lands of the Indians of the Quapaw reservation, of the confederated Miamies and Peorias, located in the Indian Territory adjoining the State of Kansas, have been cultivated under leases such as I propose, with great advantage to the Indians themselves. If the Senator from Massachusetts waits until such time as the Indians who are to have the benefits of the provisions of this bill will labor so that these lands may be cultivated, he will wait a long time. After keeping these Indians in a state of pupilage and of wardship for a couple of centuries, it is now proposed at once, without previous notice and substantially without previous preparation, to say to them "you shall take this land and on that land you shall live," and cut off from all resource except such as may exist in the soil, in their efforts to cultivate it they shall live or die according as they may labor. I say it is the essence of injustice to the Indian; I say it is the essence of inhumanity to the Indian, and I say it as one who believes that the Government has obligations of humanity to these Indians which ought properly to be discharged.

The trouble about all this treatment of the Indian is a trouble which has recently broken out. It grows out of the belief recently generated that an Indian can be taken from his wild state and educated as a white man can be educated. That finds believers because there is occasionally an Indian who is an exception, like Bright Eyes or one or two other Indians who have been named, who manifest some talent which is called very great because it is great by comparison only, and it is believed that all the Indians may at once step upon the plane which the white people of the United States occupy to-day, and that they all may become not only tillers of the soil but persons accomplished in letters, calculated to manufacture, to carry on all the occupations of life and support themselves just exactly as white people do.

Mr. President, the extinction of the Indian race will be a fitting comment on this policy. I remember a good many years ago reading an account of a man who had invented and put in use delicate machinery for the purpose of lifting the eyelids of bats that they might be enabled to see by daylight. Every bat whose eyelids were lifted dropped dead; but the inventor said he should continue until at least one bat, if the last of his race, should have the benefit of sight in daylight.

The men who to-day are endeavoring to impose upon the Indians the theories of civilization that are applicable to white men, the men who insist on taking them by the scalp, as it were, and lifting them to the plane which the white people occupy to-day, are committing an offense against the race which will result in its extermination. It is a violation of their nature, of the laws of progress, as applied to them, and the result is inevitable.

We have got to take these Indians as they are; we have got to adapt our legislation to them as they are, not as we would have them. We have got to give them the things to do which they can do. We must be satisfied if we can make them self-supporting. Whether they become the members of any orthodox church, whether they become learned in letters, or whatever else they become, the obligation of the Government to them will have been discharged whenever under the changed condition of things which our progressive civilization has brought about, they shall be able to take care of themselves, to fill their stomachs and to clothe their backs by reason of the appliances which we have put in their way. By just as much as we seek to take them beyond that we do them a wrong, and we enter upon what will inevitably be a failure. We cannot legislate them out of the plane in which they are to-day.

What is the objection, then, to saying to an Indian any more than to a white man, "If you desire to cultivate these lands through the medium of an agent, through the medium of a lessee, you may do it?" The Government will then be discharged from obligation concerning them. The Government is under no obligation to support an Indian who can support himself, but if you put them on these lands and they do not support themselves we shall year after year be reproached for it, that we have put them in a condition where they cannot support themselves, and year after year we shall be applied to, as we have been for years preceding, to put our hands into the Treasury of the United States and vote money in order that these Indians may be supported under a condition of things in which they cannot support themselves.

Let me say one thing further. The policy of the Government with reference to the Indian has been very much like that of the old lady who said to her son, "John, you must not go into the water until you learn to swim." It is said to these Indians, "You must not learn to buy or sell; you shall take exactly what we give you;" and year after year we have given to every Indian agency the same amount of flannel, the same amount of calico, of plows, of hoes, and of what not of annuity goods, giving them to the Indians irrespective of their desire for them; and it is expected apparently that under the operation of a policy of that kind these Indians would learn to take care of themselves. The great need to-day is to give each individual Indian a chance. Wherever you find an Indian ambitious enough to desire to take care of himself let him take his own property, whether of land or money or what not, and look out for himself; give it to him and not make him abide by the action of his tribe, and instead of giving him the things which the Government thinks are his need, as you would give to a child, give him the money that belongs to him and say to him, "By just as much as you spend that providently or improvidently you will prosper or otherwise." If the Government will ever come to deal with these people as it ought to deal with them, as persons who may support themselves upon a lower plane, and who may support themselves not only by the use of the land, but by the proper use of the annuities which are given them by the Government, that moment the Indian problem will be practically solved.

But in this bill it is proposed that two-thirds of the tribe shall settle the question as to whether all the members of the tribe shall accept lands in severalty. Two-thirds of the tribe, then, are to say that the other third are ready for this problem, and if two-thirds do not say so, then one-half of that tribe, who may be ready to take care of themselves, to feed and clothe themselves, are to be held to the dead body of the tribe.

I said in the beginning, as I repeat, this bill if passed will work the rankest injustice of any legislation ever proposed or ever adopted by the American Congress. If that portion of the bill which provides that these lands shall not be alienated and shall not be subject to taxation for a period of twenty-five years and shall not be leased until the same period shall pass, you will find about your doors here from year to year an increasing tumult from the communities in which you have set these people, exempt from the burdens of the Government and occupying lands which they cannot cultivate—a tumult which you cannot prevent and the consequences of which you cannot avoid.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, the Senator from Kansas is not the first Senator who keeps in his drawer old books until the covers are worn off to draw on a Senator when he puts forth an argument which he thinks difficult otherwise to answer. It has been pursued so often that it has lost all its terrors for me. It is a matter of sublime indifference whether his desk or any other desk in this Chamber is stocked with an arsenal of old records about any imaginary delinquency of people who lived two hundred years ago, whether they lived in Massachusetts or whether they lived in any other State.

I simply suggested as an argument that a condition of society in which one portion were landlords and another were tenants was the least desirable possible in this United States; much less was it desirable when the landlord was an uncultivated and uncivilized savage and the tenant was a civilized white man; and what do I get as an answer? I get an old book that has laid in the desk of the Senator from Kansas ready for an emergency, from which he would have you believe that he reads that two hundred years ago in Massachusetts there was so unwise and wicked a policy of white men toward Indians that they reduced in that Commonwealth the aggregate of six thousand Indians in eleven years to two hundred. If the Senator from Kansas thinks that is a legitimate answer to an argument that it is not wise to institute any such system of landholding in the United States as I have suggested, I pray him not to read, holding up the book here as he thus reads, when the very next sentence in the book from where he stopped alleged that in other parts of Massachusetts except the county of Plymouth the number of Indians had largely increased.

Mr. PLUMB. Let me ask the Senator, right there, how many Indians there are in Massachusetts to-day?

Mr. DAWES. That is not the question we are arguing. Just at this moment I am engaged in a little episode with my friend as to whether it makes the slightest difference to begin with the question whether two hundred years ago the people of Massachusetts were wise and humane or wicked and inhuman, like some in modern times, and whether the Senator has conveyed the truth even about the people of Massachusetts?

Mr. PLUMB. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. DAWES. Certainly.

Mr. PLUMB. Will the Senator indulge the Senate a moment in stating what became of the Indians who were settled in the colony of Massachusetts at the time the Plymouth Rock people landed?

Mr. HOAR. There was not any such colony when the Plymouth Rock people landed.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator from Kansas is as innocent of the history of Massachusetts as he is of any just and enlightened policy toward the Indians of the present day. I beg the Senator to enjoy his right of having succeeded in not only perverting history, but perverting the page that he had before him.

Mr. PLUMB. I do not care to engage in a further discussion with the Senator from Massachusetts. He does not care to account for the absence of the Indians who were in that country; he does not care to justify his own ancestors; and with that I am perfectly willing to leave it. Perhaps I might suggest that possibly they were disposed of as heretics; and that undoubtedly would bring it within the orthodox rule.

Mr. DAWES. Ten chances to one my friend will get to talking about hanging witches in a few moments; there is no knowing what. His desk I doubt not is stacked with a magazine of papers on that subject. I know of those who carry on arguments with affidavits in their pockets, that they draw as the highwayman does some other weapon when he undertakes to force positions.

Mr. President, what has that to do with this argument? The character of Massachusetts in the past and in the present will stand any little puny assault at this day that the Senator from Kansas or any peer of his or mine in this Chamber may essay upon her buckler. I will read all of this paragraph to the Senate, and then say to the Senator from Kansas that it has no more to do with this debate than the questions which agitated Kansas twenty-five years ago, and out of which she came forth a great and glorious free State; but nobody in this day thinks it becomes him in a debate in the Senate Chamber to bring up against the character of his State the circumstances of that time. Suppose I should draw out from my drawer the history of the conflicts in the State of Kansas between the free-State men and the slaveholding men of that day, and the enormities and cruelties practiced on her soil, the burning of her homes and the slaying of her citizens, does the Senator from Kansas think it would become a debate that ought to be carried on here in a spirit becoming this day and this age? Then why does he talk about what he may think and assume to be the facts of an improper treatment of the Indian tribes two hundred years ago within the limits of my State, or whether there may be other enormities of that day, judged by the standard and light of this day, that neither he nor I would attempt to defend?

Sir, the question is whether it is wise for us to continue our present or the past policy that we have been pursuing with the Indians of this country; whether it be worth while to keep them on large reservations set apart to them as hunting grounds, and leave them there to starve or feed them day by day with daily rations as you do the Army, and suffer them to groan over imaginary or real wrongs inflicted upon them in the conflict between them and civilizations in which they are most certainly to be worsted, or whether we shall endeavor by a change of that policy consistent with an enlightened humanity to take them one by one by the hand and see if it be not possible by slow degrees to lift them up to some position in this people whereby they may to some extent support themselves and learn to obey and appeal to the laws of the land in which they live. That is a question becoming the statesmen of this day, without troubling themselves with the petty question whether or not my ancestors or the ancestors of the Senator from Kansas may have, according to the measures of the light of that day, done that which neither he nor I in the sunlight of the civilization of the nineteenth century would like to approve.

I said I had hardly faith enough in the provisions of this bill to give it my support, but I know the spirit out of which it has come, and I am disposed so far as I know how to give it my support and help, improve it if I may according to the light of my experience and knowledge, not equal to that of the Senator from Kansas, I say in no improper spirit, because I have not had it, it has not been my good or ill fortune to mingle with the Indians as he has; but, sir, I have less of that feeling which it is impossible for the Senator from Kansas to disabuse himself of so long as he is a man, which grows out of the constant witnessing the enormities and atrocities that have been committed before his eyes upon weak and defenseless frontiersmen. Let the Senator disabuse his mind of the idea that anybody, whether he live east or south, or anywhere else, approves or is indifferent to any of those enormities. Such bills as this come from a sincere desire on the part of their promoters to resort to some such policy as will make the repetition of those cruelties and those atrocities impossible in the future contact of the white man with the Indian.

Mr. HOAR and Mr. INGALLS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas.

Mr. DAWES. I promised to read, and if my colleague will allow me, I will just read this, and then I beg the Senator from Kansas not to omit drawing the book out of his drawer as often as it may give him pleasure, only asking him to read it as it is:

The number of Indians remaining within the closely-settled portions of New England—

That is, in the year 1685—

was not now considerable enough to require any special precautions against disaffection which might arise among them. Four years before the revolution—

In the margin it says "1685," so that there is no occasion for the Senator from Kansas to think that means what is generally called the American Revolution; it means the revolution in England, the Senator will allow me to suggest. Four years before that revolution—

Governor Hinckley estimated their number, including all ages, in Plymouth—

My colleague has suggested to the Senator from Kansas what "Plymouth" means there—their number, including all ages, in Plymouth, where they were much more numerous than in the other colonies, at less than six thousand.

"At less than six thousand;" not more, but less. Then:

Thirteen years later—

Than the revolution of 1688—

it was believed that in Massachusetts proper—

That is, thirteen years later than 1688, which was 1700, and that was before Plymouth Colony and Massachusetts proper were made one—there were not many more than two hundred.

Two hundred left in that colony.

These were all reckoned among praying Indians, though experience has shown that in respect to security for their harmlessness their small numbers were to be more regarded than their religious profession.

And here is where the Senator from Kansas came to an end; but this follows:

But the force of the tribes which roamed over the wide tracts now occupied by Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, and Western Massachusetts was still unbroken, and had probably even been largely increased by the resort of savages who had been expelled from their seats in the war which had been waged almost continuously since the outbreak of King Philip.

With reading this extract I leave the Senator and return to the Senator his book, so that whenever he finds it difficult to meet any other argument suggested here he will have it in his desk to draw upon some unfortunate opponent.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair had recognized the Senator's colleague, [Mr. INGALLS.] Does he yield?

Mr. INGALLS. I yield.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, I do not think the remarks I made were in the nature of a complaint about the way that Massachusetts treated the Indians. I only complained, if at all, that the Massachusetts people were not willing to permit us to observe the same rule that they observed themselves, and that they assumed by reason of having extinguished the Indians within their borders that they were better calculated to say what people should do within whose borders Indians now exist. The question as to whether the Plymouth Rock people or the Massachusetts people or any other people in that State gauged their conduct towards the Indians by humanitarian principles or otherwise, is a question that I did not care to go into, but I only observed that by just as much as the Indian had been eliminated from a community, that community esteemed itself the best qualified of all the communities in the United States to say what ought to be done with the Indians now existing.

I am not going to challenge the correctness of the action of the people of Massachusetts, as I said before; but the frontiersman of to-day who comes under the denunciations of people who have what is ordinarily called the humanitarian view of the Indian question is only a man who a few weeks ago left the confines of some New England State. He finds himself on the frontier, in a new atmosphere and under a new condition of things, and he adapts himself accordingly, and then he comes to be characterized here as a man who as such frontiersman has lost absolutely all notions of right and wrong which he might have been supposed to have imbibed in the country he came from, and to be a lawless, reckless creature, intent only upon committing injustice upon the Indians, upon taking something that belongs to them. Sir, this frontiersman is not a western man except by translation; and yet the fact is that when a man who lives upon the frontier, who has had personal contact with the Indian, who knows something of his nature, who knows something of his disposition, who knows something in a practical way of the relations that are bound to exist between him and the white man who lives near him, opens his mouth to say anything about it, he is characterized at once as a man intent only upon larceny, as one who wants to do injustice that he may have profit thereby. This bill relates not to those things that specially concern the people of Massachusetts except in the sense in which justice concerns all the people of the United States, but it relates to the contact that is bound to come closer and closer between the people of the Western States where the Indians live and the Indians themselves. And therefore it is proper to consider all these questions which go to the details, to the practical effect of that contact.

Mr. President, I think the comments which I made upon the action of the people whom the Senator from Massachusetts now represents were not at all unfair. He takes issue with me upon a question of dates and a question of boundary-lines, and yet he knows that all the Indians who inhabit that section of country which he is now so proud to represent and of which we are all so proud have been entirely eliminated, except perhaps a few hundred of them who live to-day within the limits of Massachusetts, and who if they could have been benefited by contact with the superior race and by all the influences of civilization and of religion would to-day be the equals of the dominant race in Massachusetts; but I venture to say that within the limits of that State to-day there is not as degraded a set of people as those persons who have within their veins the blood of the tribes who once owned all the land of that Commonwealth. They are not the men who toil in factories, they are not the men who till the soil, they are not the men even who rent land, but they are a class of people who as a class are degraded beyond all the other people within the limits of the State of Massachusetts. Contact with a superior civilization has not only exterminated the great bulk of those tribes, but has reduced the remnant of them, the poor and feeble remnant of them, to that condition. They are not the men upon whose suffrages the gentleman from Massachusetts relies to-day for support. They are not the men who in any way are factors in the civilization which is the proud boast of that State.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. HOAR. Just a moment. I do not wish to mingle in this debate further than to say to my honorable friend from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] that he errs in his statement of the character of the remnant of the Indians that are left in Massachusetts. There are a few hundred of them, perhaps a thousand or fifteen hundred in all, I am not able to say exactly what the number is; I have it not in my memory; but about twelve years ago we passed an act making them all citizens, and they dwell in two towns chiefly. They are a poor people, getting their living chiefly by fishing, but they have a town of their own, with their selectmen, their school committee, their regular organization, and they are a very excellent, worthy, temperate, and law-abiding people. My friend from Kansas having made the statement that they were the most degraded people we had in my State, I only wished to say this much in their behalf.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President——

Mr. KERNAN. I ask the Senator to yield for a motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield for the purpose of the motion indicated?

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, the Indian question has now been under debate two hundred and sixty years one month and about four days, if this is the 26th of January, as I believe it is. I hoped it might be finally and definitely settled to-night; but apprehending that possibly some person besides myself may desire to continue the debate for another day, I will yield for the purpose indicated by the Senator from New York.

Mr. KERNAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. THURMAN. Pending the motion of the Senator from New York, I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. KERNAN. I hope not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio, pending the motion of the Senator from New York, moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to, there being on a division—ayes 19, noes 26.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from New York, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After thirty-four minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at five o'clock and five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 26, 1881.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CARR LAKE, COUNCIL BLUFFS, IOWA.

Mr. SAPP. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of a bill relating to my city alone, and that the bill be now put on its passage.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 6527) to grant to the corporate authorities of the city of Council Bluffs, in the State of Iowa, for public uses, a certain lake known as Carr Lake, situated near said city.

Be it enacted, &c., That there shall be, and is hereby, conveyed to the corporate authorities of the city of Council Bluffs, in the State of Iowa, and their successors in office, the title of the United States to the meandered lake, situated in sections 29 and 32, of township No. 74, Pottawatomie County, in the State of Iowa, known as Carr Lake, upon the express conditions that the premises shall be held for public use, resort, and recreation; shall be inalienable for all time; but leases not exceeding ten years may be granted for portions of said premises, all incomes derived from leases of privileges to be expended in the preservation and improvement of the property or the roads leading thereto; the premises to be managed by the said corporate authorities, or such commissioners as they may elect, and who shall receive no compensation for their services.

Mr. MANNING. I move to dispense with the morning hour.

Mr. SAPP. I hope the gentleman will not interfere with the action on this bill. It simply gives a small lake to my city.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MANNING] desire to interfere with the consideration of this bill?

Mr. MANNING. I do not, if it will occasion no debate.

Mr. PRESCOTT. Is there a unanimous report on this bill?

Mr. SAPP. There is.

There being no objection, the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and the House proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SAPP moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on the Judiciary, for printing and recommittal, the papers which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Arguments submitted to the Committee on the Judiciary in favor of a uniform system of bankruptcy, by members of the convention of boards of trade and other commercial organizations, January 20, 1881.

Mr. HATCH. What disposition is asked of these papers?

The SPEAKER. The proposition is to print and recommit arguments pro and con before the Judiciary Committee upon a national bankrupt law.

Mr. HATCH. I object.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MANNING. I move to dispense with the morning hour for to-day.

The question being taken, the motion was not agreed to; there being—ayes 80, noes 82.

VACATION OF ARIZONA LEGISLATIVE ACT.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour now begins; and the Clerk will resume the reading of the bill reported from the Committee on the Territories, which was left undisposed of at the close of the last morning hour.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill (H. R. No. 5501) to vacate, annul, and set aside an act of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Arizona.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, (interrupting the reading.) I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. In what way does this bill come before the House?

The SPEAKER. It is a bill reported from the Committee on the Territories, and coming over undisposed of from the last morning hour.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Is it competent for one member to insist upon the reading of every bill reported in this way?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thought not; but the reading of this bill was by consent. The Clerk is resuming the reading exactly where he left off.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. If the reading of this bill is simply for waste of time, I object. If there is any reason why the bill should be read, I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. The reading of the bill will be concluded.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I ask, by unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that the further reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that it now be put upon its passage. I can in a few moments explain the provisions of the bill, and I do not think it will be objected to.

The SPEAKER. It cannot be done during this hour in that way.

Mr. CAMP. I object to dispensing with the further reading of the bill.

The reading of the bill was then concluded; and it was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM BLAISDELL.

Mr. COFFROTH, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 6570, a bill (H. R. Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I have been directed by the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department, to report a substitute for a resolution referred to that committee, calling on the Secretary of the Navy for information relative to torpedoes; and I ask for the consideration of the resolution at this time.

The SPEAKER. It cannot be considered during the morning hour, but the Chair will recognize the gentleman after the morning hour has expired for that purpose.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I will withdraw the report, then, for the present, and will seek an opportunity hereafter to have adopted this resolution calling on the Navy Department for information.

IOWA CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask to present now the views of the minority of the Committee on Elections on the Iowa case. The report has been prepared by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. PHISTER,] and is concurred in by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. SPEER] and myself.

The SPEAKER. That is not in order during this call.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. I will withdraw it, then, for the present.

CHATTANOOGA A PORT OF DELIVERY.

Mr. BEALE, from the Committee on Commerce, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 6594, a bill (H. R. No. 7033) making the city of Chattanooga, in the State of Tennessee, a port of delivery; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. COX, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported back adversely the joint resolution (H. R. No. 355) referring to the acceptance of decorations; which he moved be laid upon the table, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that the report go on the Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas, also, from the same committee, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. No. 5816) authorizing the issue of a land warrant to the heirs of William Shepherd, deceased, in lieu of one lost; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BICKNELL. Mr. Speaker, I now call up for consideration the Senate resolution in reference to a joint rule to regulate the counting of the electoral vote for President and Vice-President.

Mr. SPEER. I ask the gentleman from Indiana to yield for the present for the consideration of the Yeates-Martin election case reported from the Committee on Elections yesterday.

Mr. FIELD. Mr. Speaker, this case of Yeates against Martin was reported only last night to the House. The report has just been printed and placed in the hands of members. It never yet has been demanded that the consideration of an election case shall be begun on the day after the report was made. It has always been customary to allow one or two days to enable members to examine the report and prepare themselves if they shall see fit to make speeches upon the question. The republicans want no unnecessary delay in this case or any other case. All we want on this side of the House is that we shall have an opportunity of examining the report, for which purpose one or two days' time should be allowed, by which means we will be enabled to vote upon it with intelligence. I should think that two days at least ought to be allowed.

Mr. SPEER. This case, Mr. Speaker, is quite as thoroughly well understood by the committee as it can be after an examination of two days or a dozen days. It can be easily understood by the House on a very brief statement of the facts. The reports in the case are short. They are succinct and clearly indicate the nature of the contest. This case has been pending here for a long time. The end of the session is approaching, and I see no good reason why it should be delayed any longer.

I desire to say further, Mr. Speaker, that the substance of the minority report was printed a good long time before the report of the minority was submitted, so that the substance of it, at all events, has been in the possession of the committee, if they desired to examine the case, for a considerable time.

Mr. KEIFER. Not as it is now. There was no minority report printed until this week.

Mr. SPEER. I say that the substance of the minority report has been generally well understood for some time.

Mr. CALKINS. I think the gentleman from Georgia will agree with me that it is not asking too much on the part of the House that at least two days should be allowed for the examination of the report and testimony. It is not unreasonable to ask that the members of the committee, also, shall have an opportunity of looking into the majority and minority reports. There is no difficulty on this side of the House, and certainly no desire to make any captious objections to the consideration of the case at a proper time. It is only asked that sufficient time shall be allowed for the examination of the reports.

Mr. SPEER. It is impossible to hear all the gentleman from Indiana has stated. May I ask what it is that he proposes, or what the substance of the agreement is which he desires to have made?

Mr. CALKINS. I say that I did not think there ought to be any objection to allowing the case to go over for one or two days, so that members of the House may have an opportunity to look into the majority and minority reports, and give to the question that consideration which should be given to it before they are called upon to vote upon it. I hope the gentleman from Georgia will not object.

Mr. SPEER. I will agree that the case be taken up to-morrow after the morning hour.

Mr. COX. I object to any agreement of that kind. The bill reported by the Census Committee may come up to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. This is a question of the highest privilege, and if the House wishes to bring it up it is within its power to do so.

Mr. FIELD. The reports cover thirty-three pages. There never has been any report from any sub-committee on this case. I agree that it may be taken up two days hence, that is on Saturday, to-morrow being private bill day. That will give two days to allow members to read the reports.

The SPEAKER. To-morrow is not private bill day.

Mr. FIELD. Then I will agree to the case being taken up on Friday.

The SPEAKER. Friday is private bill day.

Mr. FIELD. Very well; say Saturday.

Mr. MANNING. That is too late. I suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FIELD] it is hardly ever the case that members of the House read the reports. They rely very largely upon the speeches that are made; more by far on what they hear in support of the views that are incorporated in the respective reports than on the reports themselves. Not one member in twenty, perhaps, reads the reports. And I think so far as the Election Committee is concerned that every member of it is well prepared to go on and finish this case now.

Mr. FIELD. I think the gentleman from Mississippi will agree with me that this case does not turn on any single point, but involves several important questions.

Mr. MANNING. They are strictly legal questions.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I rise to make an inquiry. What has become of the motion of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. BICKNELL?] I have not understood him to yield.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. It has not been stated that the reports in this case have been printed.

Mr. MANNING. It is suggested by the gentleman from Illinois that the statement has not been made to the House that the reports in this case have been printed. Both the majority and minority reports have been printed, and both are accessible to every member of this House who desires them.

Mr. KEIFER. I wish to add a word or two. There is no objection to considering this or any other election case as promptly as it can fairly be done. I am warranted in saying that there are a number of the members of the Committee on Elections who have never read the reports, or the substance of either report.

Gentlemen will notice, when they look to the reports which we got here a few moments ago, that a bare majority of the committee have signed them; that there is not a majority of the committee signing the majority report, even. Now, I want to say that there are involved in this case some very grave legal questions, not only grave as applied to this particular case, but questions that are liable to run through a very great many contested-election cases. On some of the most important of those questions the committee divided, not politically, and they are controlling questions here. For the first time I have myself, a few moments ago, received this report. Under the rules of the House, a copy of the report when printed is to be sent to each member. This morning's mail did not bring to us this report, because it was not ready. We only find it here since the House met at twelve o'clock. We are not prepared at present to fully debate it, and there is no other case that has been hurried in this manner I think that at least two days ought to be given to those interested in this question to read and consider the reports.

Mr. FINLEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KEIFER. Certainly.

Mr. FINLEY. The gentleman is making a complaint that there has been no time given, and says there has not been a precedent of this kind before. Did the gentleman himself not force a contested-election case upon this House the other day to unseat a democrat and seat a republican when the report had not been printed but one day?

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, I did nothing of the kind. The report in the case to which the gentleman refers had been printed, circulated through the mails, and furnished to every member, and two or three days were allowed for gentlemen to read it and examine it. It was a very short report and a unanimous report. I will add further, before I called up that case in courtesy to gentlemen on the other side of the House, and especially the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. MANNING,] who was the chairman of the sub-committee who considered that case, I went to him and asked him if there was any objection to its being called up and he said no.

Mr. MANNING. That is right. There was no coercion in the bringing up of that case so far as I understood.

Mr. KEIFER. And the gentleman's colleagues will admit that there was the utmost courtesy in the conducting of that case. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FINLEY] is entirely mistaken in his supposition that I hastened and forced that case up against the wish of members of the committee or of the House.

Mr. SPEER. I do not know that every member of the Committee on Elections has read the report in this case; but I know that each member of the committee has had an opportunity of reading the substance of the report; the substance of the fact and argument upon which the report is based and the papers embodying that substance have been read and discussed by the Committee on Elections. I concede that there are grave questions in this case, but gentlemen will be quite as well prepared to consider those questions to-day or to-morrow, notwithstanding their gravity, as they will be several days later.

I make a proposition to the gentleman on the other side, that we will take up this case after the morning hour to-morrow, and will consider it without those objections which occasionally occur, without any dilatory motions. If they will agree to that I will agree, with the consent of the gentlemen around me, to postpone the consideration of this case until after the morning hour to-morrow. Then every gentleman will have had time to read the printed report.

Mr. KEIFER. Is the gentleman from Georgia submitting a proposition?

Mr. SPEER. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEIFER. I did not understand the gentleman.

Mr. SPEER. I agree to take this case up after the morning hour to-morrow.

Mr. KEIFER. Let it be the next day.

Mr. SPEER. The next day is private bill day, and the day after that will be Saturday.

Mr. KEIFER. Well, Saturday will do.

Mr. SPEER. I do not propose to take up an important case of that sort on either of those days. The gentleman has conceded the importance of this case.

Mr. MANNING. I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] to a mistake he has made——

Mr. KEIFER. Allow me a moment.

Mr. MANNING. Certainly.

Mr. KEIFER. I want to ask the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. SPEER] before answering his question, whether any limitation is to be put on debate in this case?

Mr. SPEER. That question has not been considered.

Mr. KEIFER. That question will have to be considered and decided in connection with the other question.

Mr. SPEER. That will have to be determined by the disposition of the House. For myself I have no disposition to limit debate.

Mr. KEIFER. I understand that the gentleman from Georgia has charge of this case, and probably he will be able to speak at least for his side of the House on that question.

Mr. SPEER. How much time does the gentleman want for debate?

Mr. KEIFER. I am not prepared to say. I want an hour for myself, and I know that other gentlemen of the committee likewise want an hour.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. We will give you as much time in this case as you allowed on the Bisbee case. Is not that satisfactory?

Mr. KEIFER. Allow me to answer the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. TOWNSHEND.] We offered every man on that side of the House an hour if he wanted it on the Bisbee case, and none wanted it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. We will give you an hour.

Mr. KEIFER. If you will give us the same time that we proposed to give you in that case we will be quite satisfied.

Mr. MANNING. I wish to suggest to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] that in regard to the matter of fact to which he referred, that these reports had not been read by the members of the Committee on Elections——

Mr. KEIFER. By all of them.

Mr. MANNING. Barring all that transpired in the committee-room, where, as the gentleman remembers, the reports were read and canvassed very thoroughly, and judgment was then reached and pronounced upon them, I find by reference to the signatures of these reports that they are signed by twelve members, among them the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. KEIFER. Yes.

Mr. MANNING. Five members signed the minority report and seven signed the majority report.

Mr. KEIFER. Certainly.

Mr. MANNING. Therefore I submit to the gentleman that the statement that he himself is not familiar with the contents of these reports——

Mr. KEIFER. I was not speaking for myself, except to say that there were members of the committee who were not present and who did not hear the reports read in committee, and that they have just been printed.

Mr. MANNING. I understood the gentleman to say that a very small number of the members of the committee had seen these reports.

Mr. KEIFER. Oh, no. I said that only a bare majority had seen them. I was not exactly accurate in that, for I find that the reports are signed by twelve members of the committee.

Mr. MANNING. You were suggesting as a reason for not taking up the case to-day that members were not prepared to consider it now.

Mr. KEIFER. Yes.

Mr. MANNING. That you yourself wanted an hour.

Mr. KEIFER. Yes.

Mr. MANNING. I will remark in that connection that I do not want any time myself. But as you are wanting time to discuss the case, please make a suggestion to us as to what time is wanted on that side of the House.

Mr. KEIFER. I am not able to say at this moment.

Mr. MANNING. If you make a demand on us you should go a little more into details as to the character of the demand.

Mr. KEIFER. I am not prepared to say. There are five gentlemen who want to speak, but whether each one of them will want an hour I am unable to say.

Mr. MANNING. Will four hours answer?

Mr. HUMPHREY. Say five hours.

Mr. MANNING. Four hour on both sides.

Mr. KEIFER. Four hours on both sides? Oh, no; we could not agree to that.

Mr. MANNING. Two hours on each side.

Mr. KEIFER. Oh, no. I think we will probably not occupy as much time as I have indicated, but I would not like to agree to the suggestion of the gentleman at this time. The contestee is in his seat, and will probably desire to be heard. There are members of the Committee on Elections who desire to be heard, and I am sure that two hours only on this side of the House would not be adequate to a full and fair discussion of the various questions that arise in this case.

Mr. FIELD. It seems to me that four hours for debate, with an hour after the previous question shall be called, equally divided between the two sides, is a reasonable time.

The SPEAKER. Especially at this stage of the session.

Mr. FIELD. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANNING. Will your side of the House agree to that?

Mr. FIELD. Unless objection is made.

Mr. MANNING. It is then understood as agreed to.

Mr. FIELD. I will agree to it individually. My individual opinion is that four hours' debate, equally divided between the two sides, and an hour after the previous question is called, also equally divided, will be sufficient time.

Mr. SPEER. I desire to understand if that is a distinct agreement?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts makes that proposition so far as he is concerned; and the Chair presumes it will be agreed to. Does the Chair understand the agreement to be that there shall be five hours' debate in all.

Mr. BARBER. I object.

Mr. KEIFER. I want to say that there are gentlemen here from North Carolina—not only the contestee, but others—who desire to speak on this question. At least two, if not three of the members of the Committee on Elections who signed the views of the minority, want to speak; and I think, in view of the importance of the questions involved, they ought to have the opportunity. We ought not to cut off these gentlemen with two hours or two hours and a half. At the same time I pledge the gentleman that if a fair time is given for debate, so far as my influence may go, there shall be no factious opposition to the final disposition of this case.

Mr. SPEER. We desire to know what you consider fair time.

Mr. KEIFER. Fair time is such time as will give to gentlemen who are prepared to speak in good faith the right to speak.

Mr. MANNING. How many of them?

Mr. KEIFER. I do not think beyond five.

Mr. MANNING. That would take five hours.

Mr. KEIFER. Say four hours.

Mr. MANNING. I submit to the gentleman from Ohio that in these closing days of the session we ought to be able to agree on less time than the gentleman now indicates. Four or five hours to be occupied on one side would certainly be unreasonable. It is hardly to be expected that all gentlemen interested in the case should speak.

Mr. BARBER. I object to any arrangement at this time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. SPEER] gives notice that he will call up the North Carolina election case to-morrow immediately after the reading of the Journal. As to the duration of the debate there seems to be at present no agreement.

Mr. SPRINGER. The previous question can be ordered whenever a majority of the House shall so decide.

The SPEAKER. It is within the power of a majority of the House to order the previous question.

Mr. SPRINGER. If no agreement is made, we must settle the matter by calling the previous question when the debate seems to have reached a reasonable limit.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. COBB, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Appropriations a bill (H. R. No. 7035) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, and ordered to be printed and recommitted.

Mr. BLOUNT. I reserve all points of order on this bill.

WILLIAM M'GARRAHAN.

Mr. DICKEY. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 6992) for the relief of William McGarrahan, and that it be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

ELECTORAL COUNT.

Mr. BICKNELL. I demand the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BICKNELL] is recognized and demands the previous question. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] rose for some purpose.

Mr. CONGER. I rise for this purpose: the Chair has stated that the gentleman from Indiana is recognized and demands the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana himself stated that he demanded the previous question; the Chair only repeated what the gentleman said.

Mr. CONGER. He does not say on what subject. I ask the Chair to be particular in stating the question.

The SPEAKER. The subject has been stated already. The gentleman from Indiana has already stated that he called up the resolution relative to the electoral count; and the Chair so announced. Now the gentleman from Indiana states further (which the Chair stated to the House) that he demands the previous question thereon. The Chair has stated to the House everything that he had the power to state, so as to facilitate an intelligent understanding of what was to come up.

Mr. CONGER. No doubt of that, Mr. Speaker; I was not speaking of that; but amid the confusion and noise, and by reason of the intricacy of the questions that arise, the Chair will see how important it is that we should know exactly what we are doing here to-day. I desire to raise the question of consideration on this electoral-count resolution this morning as against the field. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan raises the question of consideration which would properly come up prior to the demand for the previous question. But the gentleman in substance states, as the Chair understands, that he did not hear the gentleman from Indiana make the demand; and the Chair never takes advantage of any gentleman under such circumstances. The question is, Will the House now consider this resolution?

The question being taken, there were—ayes 119, noes 110.

Mr. CONGER. I call for tellers.

Mr. BICKNELL. I call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays are demanded by the gentleman from Indiana; which would make tellers unnecessary.

Mr. CONGER. Tellers would be the regular order. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair has always recognized the demand for the yeas and nays as taking precedence of the call for tellers.

Mr. CONGER. A vote by tellers first would accomplish our purpose better.

The SPEAKER. The demand for the yeas and nays, being a constitutional right, is recognized by the Chair as superior to demand for tellers; and the question will first be taken on ordering the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 130, nays 124, not voting 38; as follows:

YEAS—130.

So the motion was agreed to.

The following pairs were announced from the Clerk's desk:

Mr. GIBSON with Mr. CRAPO, on all questions for Wednesday and Thursday of this week; but not to break a quorum.

Mr. JAMES with Mr. BRAGG, on joint resolution pertaining to the electoral count, Mr. BRAGG reserving the right to vote when necessary to make a quorum.

Mr. BAYNE with Mr. WHITTHORNE, on this vote.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD with Mr. DICK, for this day.

Mr. BRIGHT with Mr. FISHER.

Mr. HAWLEY with Mr. WILLIS, on this vote.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee, with Mr. HOUK.

Mr. HUTCHINS with Mr. WALTER A. WOOD.

Mr. HUBBELL with Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee.

Mr. WARD with Mr. EVINS.

Mr. FINLEY with Mr. MITCHELL, on this vote. Mr. FINLEY would have voted in the affirmative and Mr. MITCHELL in the negative.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. BICKNELL. I now demand the previous question.

Mr. CONGER. Pending that, I move that there be a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The last vote developed the presence of a quorum.

Mr. CONGER. The House may order a call of the House notwithstanding. There are gentlemen who are not here attending to their duties. [Laughter.] I do not say that in a political sense. [Laughter.] Gentlemen on both sides of the House are absent against the rules.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause the Clerk to read an extract from the Digest.

The Clerk read as follows:

By the Constitution of the United States, a smaller number than a quorum of each House "may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members in such manner and under such penalties as each House may provide."

In the absence of a quorum fifteen members, including the Speaker, if there is one, shall be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members; but where less than that number are present a motion for a call cannot be entertained.

A call of the House shall not be in order after the previous question is seconded unless it shall appear, upon an actual count by the Speaker, that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read clause 2 of Rule XV.

The Clerk read as follows:

In the absence of a quorum fifteen members, including the Speaker, if there is one, shall be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members, and in all calls of the House the names of the members shall be called by the Clerk and the absentees noted; the doors shall then be closed, and those for whom no sufficient excuse is made may, by order of a majority of those present, be sent for and arrested wherever they may be found by officers to be appointed by the Sergeant-at-Arms for that purpose, and their attendance secured; and the House shall determine upon what condition they shall be discharged.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Michigan desire to be heard on the point?

Mr. CONGER. The proposition seems now to be so apparently sustained by the rules, I can hardly conceive it necessary to argue the point with the Chair. I will simply say this, that where there is less than a quorum there is no alternative, and there are but two motions which can be made—one for a call of the House, and the other that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the fact that there is a quorum present to conduct business under the rules of the House. On the roll-call just taken two hundred and fifty-four members have answered to their names.

Mr. CONGER. My object is to have the absentees, about forty members, present to attend to their duties, and I desire to state to the Chair that it is with some reluctance I make this motion. I know not that it has ever been made since I have been a member of this House or since the present occupant of the chair has had charge of its rules. But there is an important question presented here to be decided, and I have made this motion, as I have stated, with a great deal of reluctance, at a time when there is a good deal of eagerness on all sides of the House, which I share with other members present, to progress as fast as possible with this business. I shall hope, therefore, that the ruling of the Chair on this point will not prevent a quorum from being present and attending to their business.

The SPEAKER. There is a quorum present.

Mr. CONGER. But sometimes two-thirds are required.

The SPEAKER. The roll-call shows that two-thirds of the whole House are present.

Mr. CONGER. But the right of the House to compel the attendance of its members is absolute, if ordered, under any circumstances. Now, there are certain members of the House absent, as the roll-call has developed. It is certainly within the power of this House to compel the attendance of its absent members when the order is made. I only ask now that the order shall be made to compel the attendance of a quorum.

The SPEAKER. That is in pursuance of the terms of the Constitution and rules of the House when a quorum is not present; and the language of the rule of the House conforms to that provision of the Constitution.

Mr. CONGER. I ask for the reading of the rule bearing upon the question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no difficulty in deciding this question as presented.

Mr. ROBESON. Will the Chair permit me a moment?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. ROBESON. I notice by the rule which has been read under the direction of the Chair, that after the previous question has been called then there shall be no call of the House unless the Speaker finds by actual count there is no quorum present. That provision in the rule, or by that negative provision, it is declared affirmatively that at any time before the previous question has been ordered there may be a call of the House. Is not that so?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire an answer?

Mr. ROBESON. And if at any time, before the previous question is ordered, it shall be demanded on motion of a member that there be a call of the House, then the very language of this rule, which provides that after the previous question has been ordered there shall be no call of the House except under the condition named, implies the right that there shall be a call under the conditions which I have suggested.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey will recognize the fact that after the previous question has been called legislation could not proceed in the absence of a quorum; and it was in order to provide for that condition of things that the rule to which he refers was adopted. He will also observe that it does not apply to the present case.

Mr. ROBESON. But the Speaker has caused to be read to the House a rule which provides that it shall not be in order to have a call of the House after the previous question has been ordered. I will read the rule:

A call of the House shall not be in order after the previous question is ordered, unless it shall appear upon an actual count by the Speaker that a quorum is not present.

Now, then, at any other time than after the previous question has been ordered it is in order to have a call of the House, because that exclusion is only to apply after the previous question has been ordered. It is a well-settled principle of law governing all rules that the mention of one exception excludes all others.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to call the attention of the gentleman from New Jersey to the fact that the question here raised is not one that properly arises under the rule to which he has referred, and which the Chair thinks is not contained in the new rules adopted by the House.

Mr. ROBESON. What!

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that what the gentleman from New Jersey has read and referred to is not in the present rules relating to calls of the House.

Mr. ROBESON. I read from the rules of the House, clause 2 of Rule XVII, which says that—

A call of the House shall not be in order after the previous question is ordered, unless it shall appear upon actual count by the Speaker that a quorum is not present.

The Clerk read this very clause not five minutes ago, under the direction of the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not under his direction.

Mr. CONGER. It was undoubtedly read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause to be read the rule which, in his judgment, bears upon this subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

In the absence of a quorum, fifteen members, including the Speaker, if there is one, shall be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members, and in all calls of the House the names of the members shall be called by the Clerk, and the absentees noted; the doors shall then be closed, and those for whom no sufficient excuse is made may, by order of a majority of those present, be sent for and arrested, wherever they may be found, by officers to be appointed by the Sergeant-at-Arms for that purpose, and their attendance secured; and the House shall determine upon what condition they shall be discharged.

Mr. ROBESON. Now let him read clause 2 of Rule XVII, if you please.

The Clerk read as follows:

A call of the House shall not be in order after the previous question is ordered, unless it shall appear upon an actual count by the Speaker that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. There has been an actual count of the House by yea-and-nay vote, which is of record, showing that there is more than a quorum present.

Mr. ROBESON. But the Speaker will observe that that applies to where the previous question has been ordered. In this case the previous question has not yet been ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that that portion of the rule to which the gentleman has referred does not apply to the present condition of the question. The Chair desires to have read the motions which are determined by the rules of the House as always being in order.

The Clerk read as follows:

When a question is under debate, no motion shall be received but to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn, to adjourn, to take a recess, to lay on the table, for the previous question, (which motions shall be decided without debate,) to postpone to a day certain, to refer or amend, or to postpone indefinitely, which several motions shall have precedence in the foregoing order; and no motion to postpone to a day certain, to refer, or to postpone indefinitely, being decided, shall be again allowed on the same day at the same stage of the question.

The SPEAKER. It will be observed that a motion looking to sending for members is not mentioned in the rule giving the priority of motions as being in order with a quorum present in advance of the previous question.

Mr. CONGER. Then there never could be a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. There could be under the Constitution in the absence of a majority, which is recognized as a quorum, and under the rules of this House, which the Chair thinks conform thereto. The Chair does not think that a call of the House is in order in the present condition of the business under the rules, it having been shown a moment ago that there were two hundred and fifty-four members present, which is not only more than a quorum, but more than two-thirds of the whole House; so that in every condition of legislation there is in this House at present, by its record, a sufficient number of members to meet every requirement of the Constitution in the way of voting.

Mr. CONGER. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. STEPHENS. I desire to make an inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. STEPHENS. I wish to inquire if the Chair holds that there never can be a call of the House when it is known that there is a quorum present?

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not so state.

Mr. STEPHENS. I wish to know the effect of the Speaker's ruling. I understood him to hold that there cannot be a call of the House when it is known there is a quorum present. I understood him to hold that there can be a call only as in the instances cited in the Constitution and rules referred to by him. If so, I wish to say I think the ruling a great error. The Constitution and the rules give the power to less than a quorum under certain circumstances to order a call. This in no way lessens the great right and power of a majority of this House under general parliamentary law to order a call at any time before the previous question is ordered.

The SPEAKER. Our Constitution is in fact silent as to compelling the attendance of absentees except to produce a quorum. And such power comes to us only from general parliamentary law as an inherent right in all legislative bodies; and there is no rule of the House which provides for a call of the House at any other time than as stated by the Chair.

The constitutional clause providing for a call of the House is a provision which looks to the want of a quorum. The rules under that provision of the Constitution are rules which look to the calling together of a quorum of the House that business may be done.

Pending the demand for the previous question two hundred and fifty-four members have appeared of record.

Mr. CONGER. That has been stated.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is answering the gentleman from Georgia. There were, besides, many pairs announced, and the pairs are recognized under the new rules. Mr. Cushing, in considering the law of quorum, says:

It being a general rule, where authority is conferred upon several persons, to be exercised with others, all the persons authorized must be present in order to exercise it, and that authority delegated to the discretion of an individual cannot be delegated by him to another; it would be a consequence of these principles, if they were strictly applied to the proceedings of legislative assemblies, the members of which have but a merely delegated authority themselves, and constitute a representative body, that the members must all necessarily be present, and concur, in order to the doing of any valid official act. But this would be extremely inconvenient, in general, and in the greater number of our legislative assemblies, which are bodies of considerable size, would render their proceedings wholly impracticable. Hence it has been found indispensable, in the constitution of legislative assemblies, to make them an exception, in both these respects, to the general principles above stated. (Page 94, paragraph 246.)

And in paragraph 263, page 101, he adds:

The right of the members of every legislative assembly to have the presence and attendance of other members in order to a due organization of the assembly has already been partly treated of in the preceding section in connection with the number necessary to constitute a quorum. Very nearly akin to this right is that of the assembly itself, after it is constituted, to have the attendance of all its members for the transaction of business. Where the former right is conferred and measures are provided by law for its enforcement, those measures will, of course, depend upon the particular law by which they are created, and will be made adequate to the end in view, according to the circumstances and condition of each assembly, but will probably bear more or less analogy to the means resorted to by the assembly itself, after its constitution, to enforce the attendance of its members.

Under the head of "compelling the attendance of absent members," Mr. Cushing says:

Every legislative assembly, when duly constituted, has power to compel the attendance of its members; but until so constituted it has no such power, as it has itself no legal existence, and the right of the members who are present for the purpose of organization to compel the attendance of other members depends wholly, as has been seen, upon the constitution or law to which each assembly is subject. (Paragraph 264, page 101.)

And also as follows:

In the House of Representatives, on the contrary, a call of the House is of almost daily occurence; it is incidental to all other business, and takes place without the passing of any previous order for the purpose, or the giving of any notice thereof beforehand. The manner in which it is there practiced is made the subject of a special rule. (Last clause of paragraph 266, page 102.)

And in concluding the discussion of this topic, Mr. Cushing says:

When the attendance of absent members is compellable by virtue of a rule of the assembly, it is usual to provide that the proceedings for this purpose may take place when a number of the members less than the number necessary for an ordinary quorum is present, and that number, though they can do nothing else, may, of course, do whatever is necessary to compel the attendance of absent members. Thus, in the House of Representatives of Congress, fifteen members including the Speaker, if there is one, constitutes a quorum for this purpose. (Paragraph 268, page 103.)

Mr. BLOUNT. I move to lay on the table the appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The question having been put, and a viva voce vote taken,

The SPEAKER said: The Chair is unable to decide.

Mr. CONGER. I call for a division.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Michigan to call for tellers.

Mr. CONGER. I would prefer to ask for a division first, if the Chair will permit me.

The question being taken, there were ayes 115, noes none.

Mr. CONGER. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. A quorum not having voted, the Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. COX and Mr. STEVENSON called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 140, nays 5, not voting 147; as follows:

YEAS—140.

After the second roll-call,

Mr. HUTCHINS said: I am paired with my colleague from New York, Mr. WALTER A. WOOD, reserving the right to vote to make a quorum. I now exercise that right and vote "ay."

Mr. BICKNELL. I move to dispense with the reading of the names.

Mr. CONGER, Mr. BELFORD, and others objected.

The Clerk proceeded to read the names.

Mr. SPRINGER. I did not hear my name read. I voted in the negative.

Mr. CONGER. Is there a proposition to have more votes admitted?

The SPEAKER. There is not. The gentleman from Illinois stated he voted and claimed the right to be recorded.

Mr. SPRINGER. Does the gentleman from Michigan dispute my word?

Mr. CONGER. Out doors I might. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman will find me out doors whenever he desires that privilege. Does the gentleman want my address? [Laughter.]

The vote of Mr. SPRINGER was recorded in the negative.

The following additional pair was announced:

Mr. MILLER with Mr. MYERS.

The SPEAKER. On the motion to lay on the table the appeal of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] from the decision of the Chair there are ayes 140, noes 5.

Mr. CONGER. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires, as this question came up somewhat unexpectedly, to ask of the House the privilege of quoting from Cushing's and Jefferson's Manuals the law of legislative bodies relating to a quorum.

Mr. CONGER. Does the Chair propose to reargue the question?

The SPEAKER. The Chair only proposes to cite the views of recognized parliamentary writers upon the question. The Chair does not want to review or reargue his decision. He wants to quote some parliamentary law in support of it.

Mr. CONGER. The Chair has already decided the question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair adheres to his decision that in the priority of motions under the rules and practice of the House a call of the House does not come in before the previous question, a quorum being present by record.

Mr. CONGER. I might want to make a further argument upon the subject.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will be glad to listen to anything the gentleman has to say on the subject either in private or in public. [Laughter.] Does the gentleman raise the point that there is no quorum voting?

Mr. CONGER. I had thought of doing so and will do so.

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposed that the gentleman had done so; it would be natural for him to do so. [Laughter.] The Chair rules that no quorum has voted.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS (at two o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) moved that the House adjourn.

Many MEMBERS on the republican side. Oh, no.

The motion to adjourn was not agreed to, no quorum voting.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. No quorum having voted on the last vote, I move that there be a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair entertains a motion for a call of the House at this time, a quorum not having voted.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, when the following members failed to answer to their names:

| | | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| Barlow, | Ford, | James, | Stevens, |
| Bright, | Gibson, | Killinger, | Townsend, Amos |
| Camp, | Godshalk, | Loring, | Ward, |
| Chittenden, | Harris, Benj. W. | Miles, | White, |
| Crapo, | Haskell, | O'Brien, | Whitthorne, |
| Dick, | Hawley, | Rothwell, | Wood, Fernando |
| Ellis, | Heilman, | Russell, W. A. | Wood, Walter A. |
| Evins, | Houk, | Scales, | |
| Fisher, | Hubbell, | Smith, H. B. | |

The SPEAKER. The call of the roll develops the presence of two hundred and fifty-eight members. A quorum has answered.

Mr. BICKNELL. I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CONGER. I object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, then, will submit the motion to the House.

The question was taken upon dispensing with further proceedings under the call; and upon a division there were—ayes 96, noes 85.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. CONGER called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa, and Mr. BICKNELL were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were ayes 111, noes 48.

So further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

Mr. BICKNELL. I now renew the demand for the previous question.

Mr. CONGER. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CONGER. The House was dividing upon the motion to lay on the table the appeal from the decision of the Chair, and on that motion no quorum voted. My point of order is that that question has not yet been decided.

The SPEAKER. The vote will recur upon that question.

Mr. CONGER. I wish the Chair would state the question to the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon laying on the table the appeal of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] from the decision of the Chair. Upon the vote a quorum did not appear. Thereupon a call of the House was ordered, and subsequently further proceedings under the call were dispensed with. The question recurs upon laying on the table the appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. BICKNELL. On that question I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CONGER. The yeas and nays were ordered on that question.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays will be taken.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 137, nays 5, not voting 150; as follows:

YEAS—137.

When the second call of the roll was concluded,

Mr. FROST said: Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to have my vote recorded. I was within the bar of the House when my name was called, but the Clerk spoke so rapidly that I did not have time to answer before the next name was called.

The SPEAKER. The Chair under the rule has no power to entertain the gentleman's request.

Mr. FROST. I ask unanimous consent that my vote may be recorded. My failure to vote was not my fault.

Several members objected.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is forbidden by the rule to entertain the request.

Mr. FROST. May I not ask unanimous consent?

Mr. CONGER. The remarks of the gentleman in regard to himself would apply to several gentlemen who forgot to vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not entertain the request.

The Clerk having concluded the reading of the names,

The SPEAKER said: On the motion to lay on the table the appeal from the decision of the Chair the yeas are 137, the nays 5.

Mr. CONGER. No quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER. The point is made that no quorum has voted.

Mr. BICKNELL. I move a call of the House.

The question being taken, a call was ordered.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, when the following-named members failed to answer:

| | | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| Baker, | Fisher, | Joyce, | Smith, Hezekiah B. |
| Barlow, | Ford, | Ketcham, | Stephens, |
| Bingham, | Gibson, | Killinger, | Wait, |

| Errett, | Houk, | Page, | |
| Evins, | Hubbell, | Pound, | |
| Ewing, | James, | Rothwell, | |

When the second call of the roll was concluded,

Mr. HOOKER said: I ask to be recorded as present. I was here at the beginning of the call but did not answer when my name was called.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot entertain the request. On the call of the roll two hundred and forty-nine members have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. REAGAN. I hope we shall not march up the hill and march down again all day. We had better now bring in absent members, if we mean to do anything, or we had better quit this proceeding. There is no use in running this round perpetually.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. SPRINGER, there were—ayes 80, noes 76.

Mr. CONGER. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. EINSTEIN and Mr. SPRINGER were appointed.

Mr. WARNER. I presume that after the count by tellers the yeas and nays will be called, therefore we may as well have the yeas and nays at once.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 138, nays 91, not voting 63; as follows:

YEAS—138.

So all further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on laying upon the table the appeal taken by the gentleman from Michigan from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. CONGER. I demand the yeas and nays, if necessary so to do. But let me inquire whether when the yeas and nays have once been ordered it is proper to proceed in any other way than by the yeas and nays?

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays once having been ordered they run through.

Mr. CONGER. I supposed they would run through till the question was disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will therefore call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 138, nays 6, not voting 148; as follows:

So the House refused to adjourn.

The following additional pair was announced from the Clerk's desk:

Mr. SCALES with Mr. MILES—Mr. SCALES taking the place of Mr. MULDROW, heretofore paired with Mr. MILES.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now proceed to call the roll of members in obedience to the prior order of the House for a call of the House.

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a privileged question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STEPHENS. I ask the House to excuse me from the session to-night.

There was no objection.

Mr. HENDERSON. I ask the same privilege for Mr. JOYCE, who is absent from the House on account of sickness.

There was no objection.

TREATMENT OF INDIANS.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I am intrusted with a petition of unusual character and entitled to more than ordinary attention by the Senate of the United States. It is signed by Hon. John Welsh, late minister of the United States to England, Bishop Simpson, Rev. Joseph Cook, Wendell Phillips, and more than 32,000 individual signatures from every State in the Union, men and women of character, of culture and of influence in the communities in which they reside, and also by large organizations of churches, of benevolent institutions, of societies of various kinds, representing in all more than fifty thousand of the citizens of the United States.

They pray the Congress, in brief but comprehensive terms, to observe the treaties which have heretofore been made by the United States with the Indian tribes, and in the future to do justice to the remainders of those peoples. They do not couch their petition in words of arraignment or complaint, but in those of expectation and of hope for the future.

This petition has been gathering in the voice of people of different parts of this country, the work largely of benevolent females. A committee of that organization have brought the petition here and have accompanied it with a letter addressed to the Senate and House of Representatives which more fully, as well as more fitly, will disclose the object and purpose of these petitioners; and with the leave of the Senate I will read it:

To the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

The men and women of this nation herewith present their second petition to your honorable body for the faithful fulfillment of treaties and other guarantees given by our Government to the different tribes of Indians within our borders.

Your petitioners do not suggest any political policy to be pursued, leaving such matters to wise statesmanship. They come with but one thought, conviction, prayer. The thought recognizes the moral obligation of nations, as of individuals, to keep compacts. The conviction is, that recognized moral obligation should result in the fulfillment of such obligation. The prayer is for such fulfillment as being ever, we believe, the highest political wisdom, the truest national safety.

An objection has been made by some to treaty-keeping with Indians on the ground that the Indian tribes among us were never "nations," and that therefore so-called "treaties" with them were never real treaties. Your petitioners with deep feeling recall the fact that our Government has for a hundred years recognized these tribes as "nations" in its hundreds of compacts with them, calling the latter "treaties," and has by acts of Congress bound itself faithfully to observe all such made in the past, though deciding to make no new treaties with Indians. Your petitioners therefore pray for the sake of national honor, which demands honest dealing with all men, that the terms "nation" and "treaty" may be kept to the heart as they have hitherto been made and explained to the ear.

Again, it has been urged that the law of eminent domain nullifies these treaties and requires our Government to take legal jurisdiction of Indian lands, to divide the same in severalty, and to open the remainder for white settlement. Your petitioners are deeply impressed that for any Government to apply the law of eminent domain to the property of others than its own citizens is to necessitate, if there be resistance, a war of conquest, a measure wholly opposed to the fundamental principles of this Government, and that Indians with few exceptions are not citizens of the United States but are under their own legislative and executive authority as in the Indian Territory, and this by the terms of our sales of territory to them and of their titles to the same. Your petitioners therefore present their memorial to your honorable body, feeling that the plea for treaty-keeping is a protest against any enactment of Congress which would extend legal jurisdiction over territory not under the control of this Government and would do this, as for example the Oklahoma bill proposes, contrary to explicit treaty stipulations.

Finally, your petitioners would express the earnest conviction that the nation which has spent $500,000,000 on Indian wars growing out of the violation of treaties can best afford to make it to the interest of Indian tribes among us voluntarily to become citizens of the United States and not by the coercion of acts of our Congress.

Our petition of last year was from fifteen States; that of the present year represents every State of the Union and several of the Territories, and has many more than double the number of last year's signatures. The work of circulating the petition and accompanying pamphlets, has been done by few persons, and chiefly by Christian women already busy in benevolent work; yet the roll contains the names of people of all occupations and in all ranks of society; of great business firms and manufacturers; of distinguished men and officials; of judges, governors, and embassadors to foreign courts; of authors and editors; of the faculties and students of not a few of our most noted collegiate and theological institutions, and of literary and art associations. Besides all these, the roll includes the signatures of women's mission boards, Christian associations, and other benevolent societies; the names of pastors and bishops of the churches; also the records of the indorsement of a rising vote from various church meetings of different denominations; of meetings held specially to consider the Indian question; of ministers' unions in different towns and cities and of various other bodies. All these and many other evidences reveal the fact that the moral sentiment of those classes who largely make and control public opinion already requires governmental faithfulness to our Indian treaties. For this your petitioners most earnestly and respectfully pray.

Mrs. A. S. QUINTON,
Secretary of Indian-treaty-keeping committee, Philadelphia, January, 1881.
Mrs. MARINE J. CHASE, Philadelphia,
Miss MARY L. BONNEY, Philadelphia,
Mrs. GEORGE DANA BOARDMAN, Philadelphia,
Mrs. AMELIA S. QUINTON, Philadelphia,
Miss FRANCES LEA, Philadelphia,
Mrs. MARGARETTA S. SHEPPARD, Philadelphia.
Mrs. J. R. JONES, Philadelphia,
Mrs. EDWARD D. COPE, Philadelphia, Committee.

The body of this petition is exceedingly brief and couched in proper terms, and I ask that it without reading may be published in the RECORD as if it had been read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection.

The petition was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

We, the undersigned, men and women of these United States, resident in or near ——, do most respectfully, but most earnestly, pray the Houses of Congress to take all needful steps to prevent the encroachments of white settlers upon the Indian Territory, and upon all Indian reservations; also, to keep all treaties with the Indians until they are changed by the mutual and free consent of both parties, and to guard them in the enjoyment of all the rights which have been guaranteed them upon the faith of the nation.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. COKE, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 5532) establishing a life-saving station at Louisville, Kentucky, reported it without amendment.

Mr. HAMPTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill (S. No. 2111) for the construction of a counterpoise battery; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HAMPTON submitted a report on the bill (S. No. 1599) for the relief of Dr. A. Sidney Tebbs, reported by him May 5, 1880; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CONKLING. The Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. No. 2096) to authorize the construction and maintenance of a railway bridge across the Niagara River, direct me to report it back favorably with one amendment; and in making this report I beg to make also one remark.

This bridge is one authorized by the statutes of the State of New York and by the statutes of the Dominion of Canada. Across it is to run a railway, which citizens of the State of New York are engaged in constructing. Should they not have the sanction of Congress to go on with their work, it will defer them a year in their proceeding. I do not venture to ask that the bill be considered now for fear that some Senator may exercise his individual right of objecting; but I venture to hope that the Senate will allow me, perhaps to-morrow, at all events at an early day, to call up the bill, to which I think nobody upon knowing its contents will object.

Mr. JONES, of Florida, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1962) appropriating money for the purchase of a site and the erection of a suitable building for a post-office and other Government offices in the city of Minneapolis, State of Minnesota, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 6493) to provide for the construction of a public building at Jackson, in the State of Mississippi, reported it without amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. The Committee on Appropriations have instructed me to report back the bill (H. R. No. 7029) to provide for a deficiency in the appropriation for interest on the 3.65 loan of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881, and for other purposes, without amendment. I ask that it may be placed upon the Calendar, as I shall call it up probably during the day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. MORRILL. I am directed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 142) relative to the erection of a monument at the Wyandot mission, Upper Sandusky, Ohio, to report it with amendments. I give notice that, if there is no objection, to-morrow morning I shall ask to have the resolution considered by the Senate.

Mr. VEST, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1874) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Quincy, in the State of Illinois, reported it without amendment.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I have not troubled the Senate very much this winter. It is very important that the bill just reported, having received the consideration of the committee, should pass the Senate, so as to go to the House. I therefore ask the indulgence of the Senate to take it up now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I presume I shall be glad to vote for the bill to-morrow, but with two or three hundred hungry and starving widows with little private claims of three or four hundred dollars waiting on this Calendar to be reached, I must stand by them.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. We cannot get it up to-morrow; that is the trouble.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We can get up the other bills, then.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made, and the bill will be placed on the Calendar.

REPORT ON COTTON-WORM.

Mr. WHYTE. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to make a favorable report upon the concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives providing for the printing of 30,000 copies of the second revised edition of Bulletin No. 3 of the United States Entomological Commission, being a report on the cotton and boll worms, with means of counteracting their ravages, and to ask that immediate consideration may be given to the resolution.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and concurred in, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the United States of America, (the Senate concurring.) That there be printed at the Government Printing Office 30,000 copies of the second revised edition, with necessary illustrations, of Bulletin No. 3 of the United States Entomological Commission, being a report on the cotton and boll worms, with means of counteracting their ravages; 10,000 copies thereof for the use of the Senate, 18,180 for the use of the House, and 1,820 for the Interior Department.

NATIONAL BOARD OF HEALTH REPORT.

Mr. WHYTE. I am also directed by the Committee on Printing to make a favorable report and recommendation of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 224) to print 6,000 copies of the report of the National Board of Health, and I ask also that that may be immediately considered.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It directs that there be printed and bound, under the direction of the National Board of Health, 6,000 copies of its annual report, with accompanying documents; and authorizes the board to expend from the appropriation heretofore made for its use not to exceed $1,500 for the preparation of illustrations for the report; 1,500 copies of the report to be for the use of the Senate, 3,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 1,500 copies for the use of the National Board of Health.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee how much it will cost to print these 6,000 copies?

Mr. WHYTE. It will cost $5,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And how many thousand copies have already been printed?

Mr. WHYTE. None.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This is the first print?

Mr. WHYTE. Yes, and it has been delayed because there was a mass of documents from various experts, which we have eliminated.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. DAWES (by request) asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2106) for the relief of Nathaniel McKay and the heirs of Donald McKay; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CALL asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2107) to provide for the payment of a part of the interest on the sum of $250,000, under the treaty of 1856, to the Seminole Indians now in Florida; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. McDONALD (by request) asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2108) appropriating money to pay Theophilus Fisk Mills, sculptor, for the plaster cast and likeness of General Rawlins from the face of the deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. GARLAND (by request) asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2109) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. VOORHEES asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2110) appropriating $75,000 for the improvement of the Wabash River; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

BALTIMORE AND OHIO RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. EDMUNDS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, directed to transmit to the Senate a copy of the contract or terms of settlement with the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company mentioned in the letter of the commissioners to Hon. EPPA HUNTON, chairman of the House of Representatives Committee on the District of Columbia and dated March 25, 1880.

JAMES H. REEVE.

Mr. BECK. I desire, if there is no further morning business, to call up the resolution which I offered the other morning, on which I gave notice I should ask to be heard to-day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In pursuance of notice heretofore given, the Senator from Kentucky calls up——

Mr. INGALLS. I had desired to call up the resolution that I offered yesterday relative to the counting of the electoral votes, but if the Senator from Kentucky desires to speak on this resolution——

Mr. BECK. I do.

Mr. INGALLS. Of course I waive that——

Mr. BECK. Thanks.

Mr. INGALLS. Announcing that I shall take the earliest opportunity to ask for action on the electoral-count resolution.

Mr. VOORHEES. I want to appeal to the Senator from Kentucky to allow me to correct an error by which an officer of the late war who has suffered two amputations of the same leg is the victim of a mistake, and I know the Senator from Kentucky will justify me when I make the statement.

In the close of the Forty-fifth Congress the Senate passed a bill granting a small increase of pension from $20 to $24 a month to Captain Reeve, late a captain in one of the New York regiments. The bill went to the House but was not acted upon by the House in that Congress; but immediately upon the opening of the present Congress, at the extra session of 1879, the House passed a similar bill and sent it here. It has been the impression of the Senate Committee on Pensions, and my impression until yesterday, that that House bill had become a law. My attention having been called to it, the chairman of the Committee on Pensions and myself hunted the matter down carefully, and we are satisfied that the House bill sent here, similar exactly to the Senate bill which had been passed the Congress before, has not been acted upon. I ask, therefore, that the Senate will pass at this time the bill which I hold in my hand.

Mr. WITHERS. I will state in confirmation of what the Senator from Indiana has said that the records of the committee show that the case was called in committee; that the bill was reported favorably from the Committee on Pensions; and that in January, 1879, it passed the Senate.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 2180) granting an increase of pension to James H. Reeve. It proposes to allow James H. Reeve, late captain and brevet major in the Third Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, from June 26, 1865, a pension at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of the pension now paid him, deducting therefrom the amounts already paid.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CALENDAR OF PENSION BILLS.

Mr. WITHERS. By permission of the Senator from Kentucky, I desire to announce that to-morrow morning I shall ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to take up the pension bills unobjected to on the Calender and pass them. It is important at this period of the session that they should be disposed of.

FREE SHIPS.

Mr. BECK. I now ask for the reading of the resolution on which I desire to be heard.

The Chief Clerk read the following resolution, submitted by Mr. BECK January 25, 1881:

Resolved, That all provisions of law which prohibit our citizens from purchasing ships to engage in the foreign carrying trade or which prevent the registration of them as American ships when owned, commanded, and officered by citizens of the United States, ought to be repealed, and to that end Senate bill No. 741, or a bill containing the general provisions thereof, ought to pass.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, my excuse for desiring to be heard at this time is that the sub-committee of the Committee on Finance, Senators KERNAN, MORRILL, and myself, after hearing distinguished representatives of the National Board of Trade, and others, including Mr. Roach on one side and Captain Codman on the other, and after a careful examination of the voluminous reports and arguments laid before us, were unable to agree as to the best mode of reviving or restoring our almost extinct carrying trade to and from other nations on the high seas. When our disagreement was reported the committee consented that I should present my views to the Senate and the country in this form; the others will doubtless do so at a suitable time, and we hope soon to lay before the Senate for its action a bill which will at least determine what we think most likely to accomplish the great objects we all have in view. The bill we have been considering reads as follows:

A bill amendatory of title 48 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, so as to authorize the purchase of foreign-built ships by citizens of the United States for use in the foreign carrying trade.

Be it enacted, &c., That so many of the various provisions of title 48 of the Revised Statutes of the United States entitled "Regulation of commerce and navigation," embraced in chapters 1 to 9 of said title, and from section 4131 to section 4305, both inclusive, as either prohibit or restrict citizens of the United States from purchasing ships built in other countries, to be used in the foreign carrying trade of the United States, or which impose taxes, burdens, or restrictions on such ships when owned by American citizens which are not imposed on ships built in the United States, are hereby repealed; and it shall be lawful hereafter for all citizens of the United States to buy ships built, in whole or in part, in any foreign country, and have them registered as ships of the United States, and when so registered such ships so bought shall be entitled to all the rights and subjected only to the same regulations as are now provided by law for the government and management of ships built wholly within the United States and owned and controlled by citizens thereof.

I would have preferred that the bill before the Senate should have been first considered in the House of Representatives, as the full measure of relief can be more effectually given there under the power to originate money or revenue bills. We can, however, originate bills regulating commerce, and to that end modify existing navigation laws. The bill I had the honor to introduce, and now propose to advocate, purposely omitted all provisions relative to ship-stores, tonnage-dues, taxation, free material for construction or repairs, all of which the House might claim could only be acted upon in bills originating in that body. I hope they will make amendments to this bill embracing them when we send it there, as I trust we shall.

I am wholly unable to understand why American citizens should be prohibited from purchasing ships for the foreign trade where they can buy them cheapest, when all the other nations in the world have that privilege, and run their free, cheap ships to and from our ports, carrying our vast exports and imports to and from our markets, while our people are so handicapped by the high prices charged for American-built ships that they are distanced in the race, or unable to enter into the contest. I represent a people who raise fine horses, and their speed is often tested. We would consider a man a fool who should insist on making his horse carry one hundred and fifty pounds in a race when all his competitors of like age only carried one hundred and ten. Yet his folly would be no greater, and his chances of success no worse, than the maintenance of navigation laws which handicap the American ship-owner by refusing to allow him to enter the contest on the free-ocean highways of the world unless he pays 20 per cent. more for his ship than any of his competitors pay for theirs.

A ship is but a vehicle, a wagon, a car, or train, call it what you will, adapted to the highway over which it has to travel; the highway is free, and on it our ship-owners when they leave our coasts have to compete without any protection with the ship-owners of all other nations, and are entitled to an equal chance with them so far as legislation can give it. We cannot tax or impose burdens on our competitors, and every tax or restriction we impose upon our own ship-owners, or common carriers on the high seas, only enables the carriers of other nations not so burdened to do the work and make the profits which we would do and make if we had an equal chance. Protection cannot be extended to the foreign carrying trade; its operations are all beyond our jurisdiction. Protection to all home industries, including the coastwise traffic, is equal to all who engage in them; foreign interference there can be taxed or excluded; no advantage is given to one over another in the particular business. How the policy of protection may affect the general public or the revenues of the Government in these cases is another question depending on variant conditions.

It is enough to show, in order to ask for cheap ships, that American ship-owners cannot be protected in their foreign business, and can only compete when they are allowed to own ships which cost them no more than those owned by their competitors. Even then it is properly claimed that they labor under disadvantages enough; that wages here are higher, that more and better food is demanded by our sailors than by those of other nations. That is all true, but we have had experience in that regard. Up to 1860 we built the ocean-going ships, then in use, as cheaply as other people; the relative wages paid to and the supplies required by our sailors were as much higher than those of other nations then as now, yet we had, in comparatively a few years, built up more tonnage than all the world besides, except England, and we had almost passed her. Why may we not do it again, and obtain, as we had then, 75 per cent. of the carrying trade to and from this country, instead of 17 per cent., as we have now, and get a fair share of the trade of other countries with each other. Well-fed and well-paid men do more work, and do it better, than ill-paid, ill-clad and half-starved men will or can. These conditions won in ante bellum days in ocean competition, and will do it again.

England did not hesitate to repeal her navigation laws in 1849. When she needed cheap ships she bought them from us, manned them with her own sailors, earned and pocketed the freights, and never supposed that she was either degraded or humiliated as a maritime power by repealing the navigation laws passed in Cromwell's time under altogether different conditions, and when different ideas as to the relations of nations to each other prevailed. There is no sentiment in business. All the nations are now arming with the Prussian Krupp gun and the Austrian Whitehead torpedo. What do they care where they are made? We sell our Springfield rifles and Colt's revolvers to all nations. Do these arms lose any of their efficiency because they are not manufactured by the nation whose soldiers and sailors use them? Much of the machinery in our great manufacturing establishments is imported from England and elsewhere. Is it less efficient for that cause? Are our manufacturers degraded by its use? Why should ships be the only machine, vehicle, or implement that American citizens are prohibited from buying abroad.

If objection is made that England would be our shipbuilder and would thus be strengthened and enriched at our expense, while our own shipbuilders would be driven out of employment, the answer is, that we are building almost none now, that our foreign commercial marine is dwindling year by year and is almost certain to continue to do so, that the monopoly of the shipbuilding for the coastwise and interior trade being 60 per cent. of the whole is all that that industry can properly ask or expect the country to give it, and that other and far more important interests must not be sacrificed to the dog-in-the-manger policy demanded by a few shipbuilders who do not build ships for the foreign trade. There is not a single iron sailing-vessel to-day bearing the American flag, while iron ships are commanding much higher rates of freight then the best wooden ships, and a very large proportion of the heavy tonnage of the world is yet carried in sailing vessels. There is not a single American iron steamship that crosses the Atlantic Ocean from the great port of New York, and there is not likely to be for years to come unless we repeal our navigation laws.

At a national convention held in Boston, October 6, 1880, Mr. W. T. Lincoln, president of the New England Ship Owners' Association, said, when speaking of the decadence of our foreign carrying trade:

The figures will show to what an alarming extent this has prevailed:

SHIPS AND BARKS BUILT IN THE UNITED STATES.

| | | | |
|---|---|---|---|

And this condition of things exists under the laws to protect the ship-building interests. While we built, in 1879, 43,000 tons of registered vessels, there were sold to foreigners 37,000 tons, abandoned 24,000 tons, and lost 87,000 tons—making a total of 148,000 tons. It should be here stated that the sales to foreigners have been chiefly ships that have nearly outlived their usefulness, and at low prices. In view of all these facts, can it be denied that we should not have suffered such a decline if we had been permitted by our laws to have purchased vessels upon the same terms as other nations, in the cheapest market? If it can, and truly be denied, then there is no reason why we should not continue our downward course until our flag is driven from the ocean. There is no escape from such a conclusion. Iron ships are superseding the wooden. In every important respect they have proved more desirable. They secure a higher classification for a longer term of years, they are maintained at less expense, carry more cargo upon equal tonnage, and obtain higher rates of freight, and even at the enhanced rates command the preference. In the port of Calcutta iron ships obtain one dollar per ton, and in San Francisco one dollar and a quarter per ton, more than the best wooden vessels. The reason for this may be found in the difference in the rates of insurance and in the less liability of damage to cargo.

It is a most remarkable fact that, despite the boasts that have been made that iron ships can be built at the same price in this country as upon the Clyde, there is not a single iron sailing ship under our own flag. While all other nations are privileged to buy in the cheapest market, we are excluded, and for the purpose, we are told, of protecting American industry. We seem to overlook the fact that the ocean is the great highway of commerce, that the antiquated navigation laws of other countries have been repealed, so that comparatively few obstructions now exist to a perfect freedom of commerce. The large increase of the shipping of other nations, the sharp competition that has existed for business, have for several years reduced the rates of freight to unprecedented low figures. Only by the practice of the strictest economy, and by freedom from disasters at sea, could the ship-owner make the receipts equal the expenses. Meanwhile our Government has not taken the first step in assisting our ship-owners to meet this change—I may say, this revolution in this branch of business—and consequently our flag is being driven from the ocean. Lines of ocean steamships are constantly being established between this country and Europe to meet the ever-increasing demands of the trade.

We did boast of one line of American steamships from Philadelphia to Liverpool, but even that exists only in name, as one-half of that line is now composed of steamers sailing under the flag of Great Britain. A most impressive fact with respect to our trade with Europe was published in the American Ship, of New York. It stated that the grain fleet dispatched from that port last year numbered 2,987 vessels, carrying 102,312,568 bushels of grain, of which 1,075 were steamers, carrying 42,426,535 bushels, the remaining 1,822 being sailing-vessels, carrying 59,892,033 bushels. All of this tonnage includes not one American steamer, and only 74 American sailing-vessels. It is estimated that over one hundred millions of dollars per annum are paid to foreign vessels for the transportation of our produce.

This is truly a deplorable condition for a great and prosperous nation, possessing a large line of sea-coast, and engaging in such an enormous trade with the nations of the world.

There are but two courses to pursue—one is to adopt the principles of a semi-civilized age and impose restrictions upon commerce, which will be sure to cause retaliatory measures by other nations; the other is to be in accord with the progress of the age, and remove the restrictions that already exist, a relic of former days.

These statements might be verified by official tables, but it is unnecessary; the facts are too well known to require elaborate proof. The Secretary of State has furnished us at this session much valuable information in regard to our foreign carrying trade. I refer specially to the report of Hon. Edward F. Noyes, our minister to France, who, by order of the State Department, devoted six months to an investigation of our commerce and carrying trade in the Mediterranean. After stating the extent of his investigations, and the desire of the people to have extended commercial relations with us, he adds:

But I experienced a sense of humiliation that the inhabitants of the East have so little to remind them of the existence and resources of the United States. The first time I saw the American flag on the Mediterranean was at Villa Franche, where our naval fleet was lying at anchor, as I started on my journey. Again, on one of the same war ships, the Enterprise, at Jaffa. For the third time, over the vessel purchased by Captain Gorringe, in which to transport the Egyptian obelisk from Alexandria to New York; and once more on our war frigate, the Swatara, at Gibraltar, on her way to China. In not another single instance, in port or on the sea, did I observe the Stars and Stripes, except at the masthead of the steamers on which I sailed. The flags of other nations, the English, French, Spanish, Italian, Austrian, Russian, and many others, were everywhere afloat, in the harbors and on the high sea, while the exceptional appearance of our own excited curiosity and comment among the Orientals, because it had been so rarely seen of late.

I was informed by our consul at Smyrna that formerly as many as seventy-five or eighty American vessels had been seen in that port at one time. Last year there were but three, all told.

During the year 1879 two hundred vessels bound for the United States, with a tonnage of 300,000 tons, touched at Gibraltar, of which less than forty, and these of small capacity, were American bottoms. Formerly from one hundred and fifty to two hundred American vessels visited this port every year.

These examples, which are not exceptional, serve to illustrate the falling off of our shipping in these waters.

Our consul at Naples, Mr. B. O. Duncan, refers to the report of Mr. Noyes, and, after showing the immense commerce of the countries bordering on the Mediterranean Sea, the larger portion of which is American, and the fleets engaged in transporting it, adds:

All these foreign vessels engaged in the carrying trade between the Mediterranean and the United States show that there is no want of business. But the trouble is our vessels are not able to compete with them for it, for the very simple reason that it costs an American ship-owner more to build or buy and run a vessel than it does a foreigner. For this reason it was that Mr. Phelps, of New York, had to run his fruit steamers last year under the English flag instead of under the American.

Until this disadvantage can be overcome in some way, it will be vain to hope for a return of our commercial prosperity, and again to see our flag floating, as formerly, in every commercial port. It is certainly a question worthy of careful consideration and of wise legislation. The most sure and simple way to restore this prosperity would no doubt be to allow our merchants to buy ships where they can get them on the best terms, like the Italians, Germans, and other foreigners are allowed to do.

AMERICAN VS. FOREIGN BUILT SHIPS.

The effort to protect our few ship-builders by not permitting our merchants to buy ships abroad has simply had the effect of preventing a return of our commercial prosperity without benefiting our ship-builders, for our few vessels built by them at a greater cost cannot compete in the carrying trade with vessels that cost less. While foreign steamers and sailing vessels are continually finding cargoes in Naples and other Italian ports for New York, our vessels are very frequently returning in ballast, after discharging their cargoes of petroleum or tobacco, because they cannot afford to accept the rates offered for carrying fruits, marble, sulphur, rags, &c. In my humble opinion, the only possible way to remedy this evil is to permit the purchase of foreign-built vessels, and to admit free of duty all material that enters into the construction or running of ships, steam or sail. I am well aware that this is quite contrary to all the ideas of our protectionists. But in this case I think it is manifest that the idea of protecting our ship-builders results in preventing the improvement of our commerce without benefiting them. The idea I have seen suggested of remedying the evil by levying a tonnage duty on foreign vessels entering our ports would be such a violation of the reciprocity clause in our treaties of commerce that it would most certainly be resented by levying a similar duty on our vessels; so nothing would be gained.

I confess that I was afraid to quote from this very intelligent consul, apprehending that he might be dismissed, as Hon. David A. Wells was some years ago from another bureau for daring to tell disagreeable truths. I therefore wrote to the State Department and was glad to learn that the distinguished and liberal-minded Secretary of State, instead of punishing him, had promoted him to consul to Smyrna, with $500 additional annual salary. The facts stated by these gentlemen need no comments to enforce them.

Although not directly in connection with the point I am now presenting, I cannot resist reading a very able article from the New York Times of January 12, 1881, which was handed to me yesterday, especially as it embodies the views of Mr. Webster, which sustain the general positions I am seeking to maintain in this argument. The article is as follows:

In view of the attempts that have been and are to be made at Washington to induce the National Government to revive American commerce by granting bounties to ship-owners, it is interesting to notice the comments made upon the growth of our merchant marine, fifty-seven years ago, by Hon. Daniel Webster. At that time Mr. Clay had proposed what was known as the tariff of 1824—a distinctively protective measure, and Mr. Webster, who was then opposed to protection, as he continued to be in theory throughout his life, pointed out in his celebrated speech on the tariff the burden of expense that these enactments would lay upon the shipping interest. "If anything should strike us with astonishment," he said, "it is that the navigation of the United States should be able to sustain itself. Without any Government protection whatever, it goes abroad to challenge competition with the whole world, and in spite of all obstacles it has yet been able to maintain eight hundred thousand tons in the employment of foreign trade. How, sir, do ship-owners and navigators accomplish this? How is it that they are able to meet and in some measure to overcome universal competition? It is not, sir, by protection and bounties, but by unwearied exertion, by extreme economy, by unshaken perseverence, by that manly and resolute spirit which relies on itself to protect itself. These causes alone enable American ships still to keep their element and show the flag of their country in distant seas. But when we consider that the articles entering into the composition of a ship, with the exception of wood, are dearer here than in other countries, we cannot but be utterly surprised that the shipping interest has been able to sustain itself at all."

In making this statement Mr. Webster defined the exact state of the case. We were not at the time favorably situated to compete with European nations for the carrying trade of the world, and yet our superior shrewdness and tact gave us an ascendency; for, placing the average tonnage of vessels at that time at three hundred tons each, which would be a very liberal allowance, we had nearly three thousand vessels of all kinds engaged in foreign trade, and the American flag was to be seen in all of the sea-ports of the world. One advantage which we then had was found in the restrictive measures imposed by foreign nations on their merchant tonnage. Thus, an English vessel loading in the East Indies was compelled to take her cargo to Great Britain, from which place it must then be sent to the continental ports, and on account of this arrest of the voyage American ships were preferred by those shipping cargoes to Germany, Holland, and other European countries. But, as we have said, our chief superiority was in the admirable and economical manner in which our vessels were managed.

Mr. Webster was right in one respect. The imposition of the tariff, with its protective features, seriously interfered with this economy. In order to maintain their families, American officers and men were obliged to demand higher wages. But the severest blow given to the economical administration of shipping was in opening of the trade with California. For a short time our American merchants made large sums of money by the enormous freights they received, and from 1849 to 1854 they were willing to pay almost any price to competent captains and officers. At the end of that time the trade equalized itself by the number of vessels that came into it; but though large profits were no longer obtainable, the scale of wages established and the custom of fitting out the vessel with a plentiful supply of fresh meats, canned meats, &c., was still insisted on. So that instead of being the most economically managed, the American ships were the most extravagantly managed vessels afloat. And it is their misfortune that they labor to-day under the same disadvantage.

During the hearing before the sub-committee, Captain John Codman submitted a very able letter from Charles H. Marshall, of New York, addressed to himself, dated January 1, 1881, the closing paragraphs of which I will read:

The American ship-owner is, to sum it up concisely, in this position: He cannot build iron vessels in this country as cheaply as they can be built on the Clyde, the assertions of Mr. John Roach to the contrary notwithstanding. He cannot build or buy his vessels abroad because our stupid and antiquated navigation laws, like slavery and polygamy, relics of barbarism, forbid him to do so. If he should purchase vessels built abroad, he must sail them under the English flag, and own them by a subterfuge. Practically, then, he is in a position where he can neither build nor buy. Moreover, the condition of ownership in this country are much more onerous than those in England, and her enlightened policy in this regard is in strong contrast with ours. The American ship-owner is taxed by the general and local governments, while in England his competitor is free from such taxation. The consular system is a great burden on American shipping, which is made to bear actually more than the entire expense of conducting it. Under the English consular system the fees levied on vessels in foreign ports are small and unimportant, and any deficiency is borne by the national Treasury.

To give the American shipping interest a chance, and to enable it to recover a part of the carrying trade which it has lost, I would suggest, as measures which should be adopted, the following.

First. The repeal of the navigation laws so as to enable the American ship-owner to buy his vessels abroad, and obtain for them American registers.

Second. The repeal of the duties on all articles of every kind and nature whatever which are used in ship-building.

Third. Abolition of taxation on American vessels by either the general or local government.

Fourth. Permission for American vessels engaged in foreign trade to take their stores out of bond duty free.

Fifth. A revision of our consular system so as to bring the fees imposed on vessels in foreign ports on a parity with those of England.

Sixth. Changes and modifications in the laws relating to seamen, you have submitted to me six propositions, which are as follows:

"1. The admission to American register of all vessels of over three thousand tons, subject to the same laws regarding ownership that now prevail.

"2. The admission of all materials to be used in the construction and repairs of vessels of over three thousand tons duty free.

"3. The adoption of a new tonnage measurement, based on actual carrying capacity, and excluding the space occupied by engines and boilers, and accommodations for officers and crew.

"4. Exemption from taxation, local and national, on all vessels engaged in the foreign trade for more than eight months of the year.

"5. Permission for all American vessels in the foreign trade to take their stores and ship chandlery out of bond duty free.

"6. A general revision of our laws relating to seamen, and also those regulating the consular service, so that the charges which now weigh so heavily on American shipping at home and in foreign ports may be diminished and be made to accord, as far as possible, with those imposed under the English system."

I fully approve of the suggestions contained in them, which are in many respects identical with my own; and, as a beginning in the direction of restoring the American carrying trade, I believe they would be of invaluable service. By restricting the admission to American registers of all vessels of over three thousand tons, they practically protect the coasting trade, while giving opportunities for competition in the foreign trade.

The adoption of a new tonage measurement, based on actual carrying capacity, is a just and wise measure.

To your propositions, therefore, as a whole, I give my cordial assent, and I am confident that their adoption would open the way for a gradual and partial restoration of American shipping to the proud position which it once occupied. Any other remedies, such as subsidies or bounties, are, according to my mind, highly objectionable, and would prove generally inoperative.

They would tax the many for the benefit of the few, and those favored few would be the only ones who would derive the advantage. The great amount of American ship-owners would be compelled to compete, not only with their foreign rivals, but with those of their own countrymen who receive exceptional favors from the Government. It is plain, therefore, that American shipping, as a whole, would not be benefited by subsidies; but, on the contrary, be restricted to a still narrower compass.

Whether all these suggestions and recommendations are such as ought to be adopted or not, they are worthy of serious consideration and are in my opinion in the right direction.

As it is true that we now pay to foreign nations over $100,000,000 annually for the transportation of our freights, and at least $20,000,000 to carry our passengers and mails, the lion's share of which goes to England, and as this condition must exist for years to come under any system of taxation for subsidies that can be devised to induce the production of American-built ships for the foreign trade, it is not easy to see how England is so much interested in our buying ships from her, or how the stale slang of British gold being at work to carry free ship bills, can be used successfully to excite prejudice against them. England's share of what we now pay annually to foreign nations is not less than $75,000,000; that sum would purchase for us three hundred iron steamers at $250,000 each, or seven hundred and fifty iron sailing vessels at $100,000 each, every one of which would at once be placed in competition with England in all the ports of the world for the carrying trade of the nations, bringing their earnings here to be spent, instead of as now draining from us $120,000,000 a year, which never returns, but strengthens and enriches people who are our rivals in time of peace, and may at any time become our enemies in war. This item our official statisticians take great care to conceal in reporting the balance of trade.

Does any sane man believe that England desires to change the existing condition of things, and see us once more become her competitor on the high seas? Is it not obvious that the sum we would pay the ship-builders of England for the ships we may buy is a mere bagatelle compared with the immense power and profit she now acquires and holds by the utter prostration of our commercial marine, and our inability to compete with her either for our own or any other carrying trade? The life of an iron ship, steam or sail, is not less than twenty years; the single profit to the builder is insignificant compared to the many annual trips she makes during her life-time; and it must not be forgotten that if we owned ships on fair terms we could to-day compete for freights not only from one Mediterranean port to another, but we could compete from London to Liverpool, from Glasgow to Dublin, from any English port to any other, as she has thrown off all restrictions, coastwise included. It is not her interest for us to buy her ships to engage in the work she now monopolizes.

Worse for us than all else, our policy of maintaining absurd, obsolete navigation laws which we copied from England but which she abandoned years ago, has not only enabled her to quadruple her commercial marine in the last twenty years but we foolishly furnish her the principal means of support for her legions of trained sailors, the men upon whom she relies to humiliate if not to crush us in the event of war. Where are ours? Where are the trained sailors of whom we were so proud in the days of our maritime greatness? Who have we to defend the thousands of miles of coast on the Pacific, the Atlantic, and the Gulf, or our seaboard cities when war comes? No foreign foe will ever again invade our soil. If the late civil war was an unmitigated evil in every other regard, it at least developed the fact that we have when united military prowess such as the world never saw before, and that our men can be called from their plows and their workshops and be converted into soldiers on short notice, but England and the other maritime nations know equally well that sailors cannot be trained in a day, nor a year. They know that we have none now. Our future wars must be on the sea. And does any sensible man believe that England, for the sake of selling us cheap ships, desires to see us once more active competitors with her for the carrying trade of the world, and see American sailors once more enlisted and trained to resist her power and bid defiance to her fleets? Mere questions of individual profit are too insignificant to be seriously considered when national power, prosperity, and supremacy are involved as they are in this great problem.

I cannot but think that the statement of the proposition renders argument unnecessary. If there is truth or force in the maxim which all protectionists assume as the basis of their tariff and subsidy arguments that it is our duty in time of peace to prepare for war, and have all the necessary means at our command to carry it on successfully, surely in the present condition of the country in its relations to the other nations of the earth, American sailors above all other interests and classes should be protected, encouraged, and held in readiness for their country's service.

At the Boston convention Mr. Lincoln said:

Those who owned and sailed ships know that American seamen do not now exist. Our ships are now manned by foreigners, and the laws oppress the ship-owner.

And the first preamble to the resolution adopted by the convention reads:

Whereas it is a well-known fact that American seamen are fast becoming things of the past; and

Whereas we formerly pointed with pride not only to our fine American ships but to the fine body of American seamen who manned them.

I refer to these things only as proof of the statement that the American sailor's "occupation's gone." All of them worth anything have taken service on the great foreign steamship lines, or on their fine iron sailing ships. The miserable old wooden sailing craft which compose what we have left, are manned with the meanest and cheapest sailors of all nationalities, Chinese, Norwegians, negroes, and mongrels, so that it is not uncommon to find on a ship with ten hands three or four different languages spoken, the men not being able to understand each other.

Again, because I must confine my remarks to suggestions and avoid elaboration or extend them to an unreasonable length, the problem in the proper solution of which we are more interested than any other people is, how to reach the markets of the world with our products at the least cost. Our abominable protective tariff system not only adds 40 per cent. to the cost of our products, but prevents our people from engaging in producing manufactures to any great extent beyond what can be consumed at home. Why? Because the moment their products leave our shores they come into unprotected competition with free goods, manufactured from free materials, by cheap labor; so that agriculture is and must continue to be the pursuit followed by a large majority of our people, and the relative proportion must increase year by year.

Machinery is rapidly reducing the number of operatives and skilled laborers once required in our manufacturing establishments and workshops. Each new machine that performs the work of five men drives five men out of that business and forces them to make a living some other way, most probably on the free or cheap lands of the West. We have the best machinery in the world; it is to-day able to perform the work which twenty years ago hundreds of thousands, yes, millions of trained workmen, would have been needed to perform. Unlike the ship on the ocean, it does not pretend to compete with foreign machinery or foreign labor or capital, though able to do so; it is protected by law against all outside interference; its owners are content to monopolize the home market; congressional authority guards it through tariff taxation against foreign competition; its owners are content to surrender to other nations the trade of all the rest of the world for the privilege of extorting exorbitant prices for its products from fifty million people in the United States. It can now produce in six months all that this people can consume in twelve, and as it neither eats, drinks, nor needs fuel or clothes when idle, it can wait without loss or sacrifice till its products are consumed and then furnish a new supply. Its owners care nothing about the suffering and want of its servants while it is idle; they are, perhaps, Chinese or other foreign paupers. They are certainly the cheapest bone and muscle that can be procured from any country. No degradation is felt by the American machine-owner either in using foreign machinery or by driving out American by Chinese or other pauper labor when he can make money by it, notwithstanding the horror he professes to feel when we propose to allow our people to buy cheap ships to reach foreign markets with the products of our farms.

These monopolists do not want ships, they have no use for them, they will not sell their goods for the prices they are worth in the open markets of the world, and they cannot get more anywhere else except at home. They resist the importation of goods as an invasion of their monopoly. They would not care, indeed they would be glad, if there was not a ship on the seas; then their protection would be absolute. But, Mr. President, the products of the farmer must go abroad; the manufacturers and other non-producers of this country cannot consume half of them; and when there they must be sold for as low a price as any foreign pauper will sell like articles for in that market. Tariff protection does not reach farm products there. With no power to increase the home demand for our surplus which is diminishing relatively every day as non-consuming machinery is displacing human labor in the production of manufactures and the handling of freights; with railroad extension on the grandest scale, and immigration now reaching five hundred thousand a year, stimulating enormously the production of crops, and extending rapidly our already almost boundless agricultural area, some idea of the immensity of which may be formed from the fact that Texas alone contains over two hundred and seventy thousand square miles, while England, Scotland, and Ireland contain only 121,000, it becomes, as I said, the problem of the day how to reach foreign markets with our agricultural products and leave a living profit to the producer. Official statistics show that nine-tenths of our vast exports are purely agricultural products, not further advanced in the manufacture than the conversion of wheat into flour or hogs into pork. The New York Herald of January 15, 1881, says in this regard:

> With increase of population in the West and Northwest has come a remarkable growth in agriculture. To say nothing about other crops, the wheat production of the United States has increased since 1865 from one hundred and fifty million to nearly five hundred million bushels, and the production of Indian corn from seven hundred million to fifteen hundred million bushels, while from the ports of New York and Boston alone the shipments of cattle have risen from comparatively nothing a few years ago to $6,000,000 in 1879.

All men know that the whole cost of transportation is paid by the producer. If you and I, Mr. President, propose to buy a cargo of wheat or provisions to sell in the Liverpool market, we first learn what we can sell it for there, what it will cost to transport it from Kentucky, or wherever we buy it, to the seaboard and from, say, New York to Liverpool; we ascertain what will be the insurance, commissions, interest, and a reasonable profit, and we can only afford to pay the farmer for his product what remains of the Liverpool price after deducting all these things; he bears all the burden. The cheaper the transportation the more he gets; the heavier the cost, the less he realizes; he is above all other men most interested in cheap ships, low freights, and active competition. Whatever tends to stimulate competition and prevent combinations in the carrying trade on the land or the sea benefits the producers of the country; hence the struggle. I in common with many others am working to improve the great free water ways of the United States in order to hold in check railroad combinations.

The Eads jetties at the mouth of the Mississippi have been of incalculable value to the West. The continuance of the improvement of the navigation of that great river and its tributaries, on which every man has a right to place a barge or a boat to float his products to the point where he meets the ocean-going ships, would save millions to the people, and millions more would be saved if they could meet free, cheap ships there to haul their products to their ultimate markets. I could name five railroad magnates who can meet to-day and in five minutes make an agreement to increase freights a few cents a bushel on grain and a dollar or so a ton on other goods, and thus add $100,000,000 or more of taxation or burden on the people; and there is now no means to prevent it and no remedy for the wrong, so the great English, French, and German lines can by combination double ocean freights as they did on wheat in 1873, and thus take millions out of the pockets of the producers of the West. As I would do all possible by opening free water ways to render railroad combinations if not impossible at least more difficult, so I would give our people free ships, free stores, freedom from tonnage dues and consular fees, and freedom from every possible tax in order, as far as legislation can effect it, to render combinations of foreign ship-owners very difficult if not impossible.

Every reflecting man must see the uncertain, the very precarious tenure by which the present prosperity of the country is held. We are necessarily large exporters. Our exports are of a character that must go to market when ready; the fat hog cannot be kept; provisions, flour, indeed all agricultural staples, must be sold and consumed when prepared for market. We have no ships in which to transport them. We cannot build them, and are not allowed to buy them abroad. If England, France, and Germany, to whom we have surrendered our carrying trade, should go to war with each other, as they have often done and may do again at any time, although we may continue to maintain the most friendly relations with all of them during the strife, we would suffer more than all the belligerants. The destruction of the merchant ships of either by the cruisers of the others would take our products to the bottom of the ocean. Even the suspension of their traffic or the blockade of their ports would leave our exports to rot on the wharves or be consumed by warehouse charges. National bankruptcy would soon follow; yet the honest earnest efforts of those of us who seek to avoid and avert such calamities by allowing our own citizens to buy cheap ships in which to carry our own goods are characterized as being made in the interests of England, and as being designed to destroy the industries of the United States. When the Franco-Prussian war broke out Congress was in session and on the 15th of July, 1870, President Grant sent a message to both Houses advising them of the fact, and of the inadequacy of our ships to carry our freights and mails, saying:

> I submit to the consideration of Congress that the interests of the country will be advanced by the opportunity to our own citizens to purchase vessels of foreign construction for the carrying trade of the country.

And he urged upon Congress the propriety of considering these important questions. Congress adjourned in less than twenty-four hours after that message was received, doubtless as the best means of avoiding even a discussion of the subject. Then, as now, the protected monopolists determined to allow no interference with their privileges, no matter what happened. Even the power and influence of General Grant was not sufficient to secure for his recommendations a respectful consideration. It is a conceded fact that Germany purchases from England the ships which she runs in our trade. We allow the Germans all the rights and privileges in English-built ships which we allow American citizens in our home-built vessels, and yet prohibit our own people from buying ships on the same terms the Germans do. Section 4229 of the Revised Statutes of the United States reads thus:

> No other or higher rate of duties shall be imposed or collected on vessels of Prussia, or of her dominions, from whencesoever coming, nor on their cargoes, however composed, than are or may be payable on vessels of the United States, and their cargoes.

We have by treaty with Sweden and Norway granted the same rights to the people of those countries that the Germans have; while by treaties with Great Britain, France and other great commercial countries, we accord to them all the rights and privileges given to the most favored nations, so that we practically allow the world, except our own citizens, to enter into free competition, in free ships, for our carrying trade. Surely the Senate has a right to originate a bill to give American citizens the same rights that by treaty, without consulting the House of Representatives, it has given to all other nations; therefore I did not feel that any prerogative of the House was invaded or impaired by seeking to pass first in this body the bill I introduced to regulate our carrying trade, by the repeal of navigation laws which injure ourselves and give advantages to citizens of foreign countries.

I am unable to appreciate the wisdom of a policy which transfers the carrying trade of the United States from American to German and other foreign ship-owners, by forcing the American to pay $400,000 for a ship which they can buy for $300,000; or, failing to do that, prohibit him from engaging in the transportation of freights or passengers to and from this country, or any other.

Mr. President, if you and I owned farms side by side, equal in every respect, and raised the same crops on each, and you were prohibited from owning reapers, threshers, or wagons, to cut, prepare, or haul your produce to market, while I had all of them, of the best quality, bought in the cheapest market, and used them to secure my crop without outlay of money, doing all that work for you besides, charging you ten or twenty per cent. for doing it, would I not get rich much faster than you? Could I not, should I so determine, easily bankrupt you by refusing to cut, thrash, or haul for you, and letting your grain rot in the field? That is precisely the relation that foreign nations occupy toward us to-day. They take a large share of the profits of our crops for carrying them to market, and could bankrupt us by refusing to haul for us.

I would be glad, of course, to see all our ships built at home; but that cannot be done. They are not built here. If they could be they would. The pretense that the late war destroyed our carrying trade no longer deceives anybody; it was only crippled temporarily. To-day we have less than one-half the tonnage in the foreign trade that we had when the war closed, while nearly all the other branches of industry have doubled, and many of them have increased fourfold. These industries could be protected from foreign competition, and they have been; the tax-payers and consumers have paid and suffered enough in order to afford the protection demanded, but the ships in the foreign trade were necessarily beyond the reach of protection. Congress could not reach out into the ocean and drive other people from it, and our ships are gone.

Something must be done, unless we are prepared to abandon forever the carrying trade of this country and of the world to foreigners, and pay them whatever they demand for doing the work. The American sailor must disappear, and our power even to defend our coasts and seaboard cities be given up, unless we re-establish in some form our mercantile marine.

It is said that our people will not buy ships and engage in the foreign carrying trade even if they are allowed to have free ships for that purpose. If they do not the right to buy will do no harm even to the would-be ship-builders. Men of intelligence made themselves absurd enough to tell our sub-committee that all sorts of miserable, worthless ships would be palmed off upon our people if they were allowed to buy them abroad, and long lists were paraded of worthless ships which English agents were now prepared to offer. It is a poor compliment to the intelligence of our people to say that they do not know what they want and what the thing offered is worth. I suppose a man who needs a ship for a particular purpose can select it and contract for it as well as a manufacturer who needs and buys an English engine or any other piece of machinery in his factory can select it, and can as well be trusted to attend to his own interests. Apprehension is sometimes absurdly expressed lest ships built on the Clyde might not be as loyal and as patriotic in time of war as ships built on the Delaware. I suppose a Krupp gun, though made in Prussia, shoots as well from the turrets of an English iron-clad as if it had been cast on the Thames or the Mersey; and the Whitehead torpedo, though made in Austria, will do its work as well from Cherbourg or Sandy Hook as if it had been constructed there. All that class of arguments appeal only to prejudice.

The bitterest opponents of free ships admit the present deplorable condition of our commercial marine, the almost total destruction of our carrying trade, and the extinction of our sailors. The reports of our consuls, of our statisticians, and of our ship-builders agree that we have touched bottom; they admit that we can neither be strong as a belligerent nor prosperous as a people until our once envied position on the high seas is restored; but with few exceptions they dare not tell the truth and expose the true cause of our humiliation as a maritime nation. They whine over the destruction of a few wooden ships during the war, and the transfer of others to foreign flags, which they would not allow our people to take back when the danger was over, fearing dismissal from official position if they venture to say aught that may be distasteful to their masters. They unite in the cry for subsidies to be granted to American ship-builders, who already have a monopoly of ship-building for the coastwise trade, which is 60 per cent. of all we have. The cry is raised under the pretense of the necessity for carrying the mails, or some other subterfuge, so as to equalize the cost of their ships with the price foreigners pay, and thus enable our own ship-builders to charge what they please. Subsidy and taxation enough can equalize anything. When asked whether we are to be required to tax the people to an extent sufficient to enable Congress to subsidize every American ship on every line and on every sea, whether she is propelled by sail or steam, they hesitate, and are divided in opinion as their interests vary. Of course the only logical proposition is to treat all alike; otherwise, if one set of American ship-owners are furnished with money out of the public treasury to enable them to drive all the unsubsidized American ships off the high seas, that result would not cheapen our transportation, nor increase our tonnage in the carrying trade; it would simply create a monopoly in the hands of the protected few on the subsidized lines, and the tax-payers, from whom the money is taken, would derive no benefit from, indeed, would be injured by, the subsidy.

It would be too big a job, Mr. President, to tax the people enough to subsidize all the ships needed in our rapidly growing carrying trade to the extent necessary to pay American ship-builders the price they demand for the ships they propose to furnish beyond what other nations now pay for theirs. That has to be done or the proposed subsidy system would fail to accomplish the object its advocates propose; and it is a serious question what new objects or subjects of taxation Congress could devise from which to raise the necessary means to furnish the subsidies demanded. Will the men of wealth consent to a tax on their incomes to furnish the means? I doubt it. Will Congress restore internal-revenue taxation on manufactures or taxes in the form of licenses to carry on professions or trades? Of course not. An increase of tariff taxation, as we all know, would diminish instead of increase revenue. That source of supply can only be increased by reducing protective and prohibitory duties; and all the subsidy seekers and their retainers are at the same time advocates of high protective tariffs.

Senators need not deceive or delude themselves with the assumption that there is to be a continual large surplus of revenue under our present system of taxation. In their zeal to appear patriotic or to pander to the soldier element they have by the arrears-of-pension bill—which I congratulate myself in having opposed—fastened upon the country a heavier and more enduring burden than the national debt, and one which will drain the pockets of the tax-payers longer. Over $500,000,000 is now the Commissioner's estimate of the amount required for arrears alone. It was said $30,000,000 was the maximum when the law was passed. The annual pension-roll has run up from about $30,000,000 to over $50,000,000 in a year or so; it will soon reach a sum larger than all the annual expenditures of the Government ever reached prior to 1860. Pensioners never die. Pensions are paid now to over ten thousand people as survivors of the war of 1812, which closed sixty-five years ago, and many plain people believed there were not many more than ten thousand soldiers, all told, engaged in it.

But that is a digression. The high protective tariff, against which it is in many quarters regarded as worse than treason to speak, has more to do than all else with the prostration and destruction of our commercial maritime and the ruin of our carrying trade. That system which was built up during the war to meet temporary exigencies and our navigation laws combined constitute an ingenious plan of disguised taxation, to give American manufacturers the right clandestinely and under false pretenses to force the American people to pay them 50 per cent. more for the products of their machinery than they are worth, or than they can make any other people pay. It is so adjusted as to cripple if not prohibit the sale of American manufactures in countries other than the United States, and to protect foreign nations and especially England in a monopoly, as against us, of the carrying trade of the world. The whole system is vicious, and but for our immense territory and almost inexhaustible resources would before this have proved ruinous.

To illustrate: the necessity for a great railway is made apparent in order to extend commerce, cheapen transportation, and furnish facilities for intercourse among our people. Congress makes large grants of lands to the private corporation that works up the scheme, and I may note here that it has granted to railway corporations since 1860 more lands, belonging to the people, all within twenty miles of railroads, than there is in the thirteen States which formed the United States. That is the railroad's share of the spoils. The people expect in return a cheap road and cheap transportation. Do they get it? No. The railroad corporation has to agree to build its road with American rails, which are protected to an extent of $28 a ton, and use other costly machinery. It is not allowed to furnish cheap transportation or build a cheap line. When finished it does not compete with existing lines. They combine, pool their issues, keep up prices, pocket the proceeds of the lands, and denounce any Senator or Representative who ventures to criticise their conduct or who seeks to limit their power. The railroad thus built removes the mere physical obstacles, but Congress by its tariff legislation creates far more formidable ones.

After reaching, say, the Pacific Ocean, which is free, over the roads we paid for, we cannot trade with China, Japan, or the Indies. Congress has placed an insurmountable obstacle, which Senators and Representatives here dare not remove, in the form of a tax prohibiting nearly all goods from all these countries from being landed on our shores, for fear the people who built the road may get cheap supplies. And after they reach that or any other ocean on the road so built, they are not allowed to send their products to any other port of the United States unless they are sent in an American-built ship. Our people cannot buy their own ships abroad, and if a foreign ship is ready to carry from the railroad port to any other United States port for $1 a ton and the American-built ship asks $5 to do it, the producer must pay the $5 or let his goods go to waste. All combinations work together to rob alike the producer and consumer.

I repeat, the protected American manufacturer cares nothing about ships; he does not need them, and of course does not want them. He cannot or will not send his products abroad. He knows that when they leave our shores they are worth no more than similar goods made by so-called foreign paupers, against whose labor he has been protected at home by tariff taxation. The very act of sending his manufactures abroad is an admission that he does not need protection at home, and that our taxation for his benefit is wrongfully or at least unnecessarily imposed. He would rather not send his goods abroad than make that admission; therefore he cares nothing about cheap ships.

He is equally opposed to goods being imported which may compete with his; he prefers to have a monopoly of home markets. He may not say so, but Mr. Carey, of Philadelphia, spoke the sentiments of most of this class when he said that it would be a blessing to the American people if all foreign intercourse was cut off and the great, free ocean highways of the world were converted into seas of fire. No aid need be expected from that class for any measure which seeks to cheapen anything or which tends to liberalize our intercourse with the world.

Protectionists boast, and seem to regard it as a conclusive argument in favor of their system, that they are obliged to charge higher prices because they pay higher wages to their operatives than are paid for like services elsewhere. One thing is certain, they employ the cheapest labor they can procure, whether it is Asiatic, African, European, or American. No navigation laws prohibit that. Of course they pay higher wages. Men do not labor for money alone. Their necessities compel them to labor for what money will procure. The dollar is the pound-weight, the yard-stick, the bushel-measure. As a pound-weight, a dollar here only weighs out to the laborer ten pounds of sugar; in England it weighs fifteen pounds. As a yard-stick, 85 here only measures to the laborer one pair of blankets; in England it measures two pair. And so it is with all else that he or his family need for clothing or comfort. As a bushel-measure, however, a dollar here will measure 50 per cent. more wheat, flour, or provisions than it will in England. Why? Because they are farm products. The price of all these things is regulated by their market value in unprotected foreign markets. Protection does not reach the farmer, except as it compels him to pay out of what he sells in open market in competition with all the world 50 per cent. more than any of his foreign competitors pay, and more than they are worth for the clothing and other necessities for his family, for the machinery and tools he is compelled to have to produce and prepare his crops for market; and so-called protection compels him to pay the high wages to his laborers necessary to enable them to buy at protective-tariff rates what they and their families require in order to live as comfortably as the laborers of other countries.

Whenever it is conceded that any article is produced here in such quantity that it cannot be consumed at home, but the surplus must be sold abroad, it necessarily follows that the price of the surplus in the foreign market regulates the home price of the whole product. Take as examples cotton, wheat, tobacco, or any like great staples: they rise and fall here as prices vary in Liverpool, Paris, and Berlin. Our producers of these and like staples cannot be protected. The pretended protection by tariff duties on the importation of any articles of that character is simply a delusion, if it is not a fraud. Articles not produced in sufficient quantities here to supply the home consumption occupy a different relation. Take sugar as an example. We consume about nineteen hundred million pounds annually; 90 per cent. of it is imported. The average tariff duty being 60 per cent., the home producer of course sells his product 60 per cent. higher than he could if foreign sugars were free. I may as well state here the effect cheap supplies have on consumption as illustrated by sugar. We are constantly boasting of how well fed our people are, and how near the starvation point the people of England hang. There sugar is free and cheap, the consumption of it is sixty-five pounds a year for every man, woman, and child in the land. In the United States it is thirty-eight pounds per capita. The English people are at least not starving for want of sugar. I am not seeking to interfere with the sugar tariff. It produces $42,000,000 of revenue annually, while steel rails, with $28 a ton protection against foreign invasion and protection by a patent against home competition, enables eleven corporations, whose product is over one million tons a year, to pocket $28,000,000, less the few millions they have to subscribe periodically for campaign-corruption funds, in order to secure power to the party that maintains their privileges, which protection provides little or no revenue to support the Government, and gives no relief to the tax-payers.

The effect of the monopoly given to the blanket manufacturers is perhaps worse on the laboring classes than the Bessemer steel monopoly, especially during such a winter as this. Nearly 100 per cent. tax as protection is given on coarse blankets such as the poor must have, forcing them to pay $4 for what no other laborers in the world pay over $2 for, with no revenue received from the tax. It is simply stealing that much out of their hard earnings in ways they know nothing of. Little wonder they must charge higher wages than other people or starve. Little wonder we have factories closed half the year and operatives striking for increase of pay.

Our monopolists cannot exact their prices from any other people than our own, therefore our exports of manufactured products are comparatively insignificant, and the employment of our skilled laborers in manufacturing establishments is very precarious. It is only when manufacturers have marked up their prices so high that consumers can afford to pay the true value of what they want in open market and the tariff tax to boot, rather than submit to their extortions, that the Government gets any revenue. Our large revenues of late grew out of the exorbitant prices so demanded, which was called a boom by those who pocketed the congressional bounty.

One of the greatest evils growing out of this vicious system of protection is that under it there can be no assurance of stability. It is like the petroleum bonanza, which was so profitable at first that everybody rushed into it until the product became so great and the prices fell so low that the man who had most of it was poorest. It does not take long when the market is limited to the wants of our people and all trade with the 1,400,000,000 people in the outside world is abandoned to other and wiser nations for our manufacturers, after everybody who could have rushed into the business, to overstock the market and bankrupt each other. Low prices follow, revenues dwindle, consumers of course will not pay the foreign price and the tax; they can do better by closing up the overstocked home bankrupt estates at forced sales.

But, Mr. President, I have wandered somewhat from the free ship question. I confess that I do not hope to recover our former prestige on the seas, even with free ships and the removal of all possible burdens from the carrying trade, while the present abominable tariff is maintained. Therefore I could not help referring to its pernicious effects. An American may start a free, cheap ship to-day with all the restrictions we can by legislation take off removed, side by side with an English ship off the capes of Delaware, Sandy Hook, or anywhere else, with precisely the same cargo on board, and, if such a possibility could be imagined, composed of manufactured goods which cost precisely what the similar goods on board the English ship cost, and they may sail side by side to any American, European, African, or Asiatic port, and the Englishman has every advantage. He is prepared to trade. The men who want the goods often have no money, but they have copper, wool, and other raw materials that he wants, and he swaps his manufactured goods for their raw materials and starts home with what his manufacturers need, furnishing supplies to English laborers to work up into another cargo for him to take back and swap again. He has a full and profitable load both ways, and he can carry cheaply because he has.

All trade, all commerce is barter. You must take what I have or I cannot buy what you seek to sell. The conditions as regards climate, education, or opportunities of some other people enable them to produce certain things which we need better and cheaper than we can. Other conditions enable our people to produce other things that they need better and cheaper than they can produce them, therefore we trade and both are benefited. New Hampshire raises potatoes, Cuba raises oranges. Cuba wants potatoes, New Hampshire wants oranges. The New Hampshire man carries his potatoes to Cuba and swaps them for oranges; both parties are benefited and the greatest profit is with the party that did the hauling to supply what both needed. That is the carrying trade. In that the American is crippled by the abominable tariff enacted under pretense of protecting American industry, but really devised to enrich a favored few at the expense of the mass of the people. The American, in the case put, offers his cargo for sale alongside of the Englishman; it is equally good; the people at the port where he landed want it and offer all they have in exchange for it, just as they did to the Englishman. He cannot trade for any of them, because he cannot land what they offer at any port in the United States without paying on an average 45 per cent. on the value of what he brings back.

The American producer of like articles is willing to furnish the same things for 42 per cent. more than they are worth, therefore he must sell his cargo abroad for money, and of course take less for his goods in order to get it, and often return home without a cargo. He must either charge the expenses of his trip both ways to the freight he carries out, or work at great disadvantage with his English competitor; if he charges both ways on the cargo he carries out, the producer suffers; if he cannot do that, he suffers. Therefore, as I said, I feel the embarrassment our tariff imposes on our ocean-carrying trade after we have relieved the ship-owner all we can. My idea is that whatever aid any business receives that does not naturally pertain to the business itself is, in the end, detrimental to it; or when government seeks to support it by outside subsidy it ends in failure. Whatever lightens the burdens on ships or anything else in what inheres to the business helps it.

Mr. President, I do not expect nor do I propose to repeal our tariff laws, firmly as I believe that we, above all other people—with our energy, intelligence, and versatility of talent; with a continent under our control, with every variety of soil and climate, with free trade among ourselves—are more interested in free trade with all nations than any other people. I would not destroy, or cripple even, any artificially sustained industry by a sudden change. I would reduce taxation gradually, and thus increase the revenue by inviting fair competition from all quarters and by removing prohibitory obstructions; revenue should be the prime object, protection the incident. I would simplify the present compound and complex mode of assessing duties so that honest business men could understand them. A tax, as now, on the same piece of goods of so much, according to the number of threads to the square inch; so much specific, and so much ad valorem, is both absurd and dishonest. I would lighten the burdens of the laboring poor by allowing them to procure the necessaries and comforts of life at reasonable rates, so that their wages might procure as near as possible what the wages of laborers in other countries now purchase for them.

It is not honest legislation which takes at least 30 per cent. of a laborer's day's wages from him to protect or subsidize any set of men or corporations or the machinery they own, or which requires the humblest man in the land to pay as much to support the Federal Government as Mr. Vanderbilt does with his untold millions, yet that is the fact to-day under our tariff taxation. I protest against the imposition of additional taxation on the people to raise money to pay subsidies to any set of men, either under pretense of carrying mails on steamship lines or on any other false and absurd pretense; nor would I restrict trade or commerce by discriminating or oppressive regulations. They only produce retaliatory measures. France, the richest country in Europe, now prohibits any article of American manufacture from being landed on her soil, while she allows the manufactures of England and Germany to enter her ports on an average tariff of 10 per cent. She thinks that she punishes us in this way for our taxation of her manufactures. If she knew how well content our manufacturers are with the monopoly they now have of our home markets, and could realize how little they care for or desire to have a free market such as France would afford, she would not care to enforce restrictions which make no difference. France now takes our grain, provisions, petroleum, alcohol, and other things that her people must have at cheap rates.

In short, our whole system of protection is robbery of our own people to enrich favored combinations of wealth and power at home, and starve, by restricting sales to this country, the laborers whose work depends upon the continuous running of the machinery owned by these pets of Congress. I would exhaust legislative power in earnest efforts to compel cheap production of manufactures here and force the machine-owners to send their products abroad in order to require increased home production, and thus extend our commerce and carrying trade by their sale to all nations, taking in return the necessary materials for the production of other or like manufactures, so that our operatives would have continuous instead of uncertain employment. We might double or quadruple our various industries and thus furnish a home market for a much larger portion of our agricultural products than we can now.

As the first great practical step in accomplishing these ends, I would repeal our navigation laws so far as they prohibit the purchase of ships abroad by our people for the foreigh trade, hoping that the vast shops for repairs which must at once spring up would soon become yards for ship-building, as I believe with our exhaustless resources in iron, coal, and lumber, and the mechanical skill of our people, they would soon become. The truth is, we are now a corporation and combination ridden people. I do not know that the shackles can be broken. Disorganized militia rarely fight regulars successfully, no matter how just their cause or how superior the number on their side may be. Privilege and power working together generally succeed. The people will yet learn and understand that the present tariff is carefully adjusted to protect the American manufacturer in forcing American consumers to pay them on an average for everything he makes 45 per cent. more than it is worth, while our navigation laws now operate with equal power to protect the foreign ship-owner from American competition. Congress and the country are now agitated with grand projects for canals and ship-bearing railways from the Atlantic to the Pacific by Panama, Tehuantepec, and Nicaragua. The Monroe doctrine, American protectorates, and all sorts of patriotic buncombe is the order of the day. If we had all these routes open—and I want them all—in the present condition of our commercial marine, they would be of very little value to us as carriers on the high seas. England, France, and Germany would utilize them as they do the great Suez Canal, on which the American flag is never seen except on some ship belonging to the Navy.

The first step in the right direction that I have observed is that of which we were advised last month by the late Secretary of the Navy when he notified Congress that he had taken possession of the grand harbors and coaling stations of Chiriqui and Golfito, on the Atlantic and Pacific sides of the Isthmus of Darien about equidistant between the proposed Panama and Nicaragua routes, in close proximity to inexhaustible mines of coal. Up to this time England controls the world's commerce through her coal trade perhaps more than through any one agency. With a coal area less than that of either Kentucky or Pennsylvania, she produces and uses over 160,000,000 tons a year. We produce less than 60,000,000. Her population is not more than half what ours is, but her coal is sent to and sold at every port and commercial station in the world. She has her stations secured by treaty with every nation on the east and west coasts of South America, and to-day we cannot send a steamship from our Atlantic to our Pacific ports unless she consents to sell us coal at her stations, as we have none of our own.

Mr. President, I have pointed out some of the obstacles in our way. I do not pretend that free ships will remove them all. The charges for pilotage, for consular fees, for tonnage dues, perhaps should all be released, free stores should be allowed, every federal tax can be taken off, and perhaps influence might be exerted here to induce the States to remove local taxation from all ships engaged in the foreign trade, I am not now prepared to say how. For example, Maryland is urging Congress to build a ship-canal connecting the Chesapeake with the Delaware, to avoid the tedious, difficult, and often dangerous navigation round the Capes. It would cheapen the transportation of all western products greatly. It is of course costly. Suppose we furnish the money to build it on condition that Maryland shall remove all State and local taxes on foreign-going ships, and she does it. New York and all the other States must follow, and the producers and ship-owners would be alike benefited. Other and better means may be suggested. The present requirements as to the discharge of sailors in foreign ports need amendment. They are extremely oppressive on our ship-owners, and measurements of tonnage should be limited to the actual freight-carrying capacity of the ships. Everything that the American ship-builder needs to build or repair ships for the foreign trade, from a compound engine down to a rivet, should be absolutely free. If I could I would allow him to pay off the wages of his laborers in free clothing, blankets, and other necessaries for themselves and their families, so that the cost of his labor in building and repair of ships in his yard should be lightened.

My sole object is to take all steps possible at the earliest moment, and at the least cost, to restore our commercial marine and regain our share of the carrying trade of the world. I oppose the tariff taxation and subsidy system as I would oppose building a Chinese wall round the borders of this Republic. I have no more respect for the obsolete navigation laws of Cromwell than I have for the laws that burned witches, or prosecuted men for their religious opinions, in his day. "Old times have changed, old manners gone." Men of different nationalities no longer think it necessary to destroy each other in order to be great. They seek to trade rather than fight, and by exchange enable each to have the comforts which the varied climates, conditions, and talents of all can supply. Free intercourse means cheapness and abundance of all these things to the masses. Restriction on trade and intercourse, taxation and subsidy, all produce scarcity and increase cost.

England and her dependencies buy now more than one-half of all we sell to the world. They are our best customers, because they art allowed to buy at prime cost. They are rich because their earninge purchase more than the same amount will elsewhere. Believing thas a liberal policy will make us the greatest people upon earth, I seek to remove all restrictions as rapidly as possible; and as we are building no ships for foreign trade, and have none, I trust Congress will allow our people to buy them as all other people do, and enter the contest for the business of the world once more on something like fair terms.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, if the Senate will indulge me I should like a few moments, not to reply with any elaboration to what the Senator from Kentucky has said but to speak very briefly on the various points suggested by him. I should not like to have such a speech as he has delivered go out from the Senate of the United States unanswered for a single day, and I propose, therefore, to review his position at least in part. I regret that I am compelled to speak without preparation and with no data except such as I recall from memory.

The first observation I desire to submit is that the honorable Senator from Kentucky very frankly admits, and did not even attempt to argue against it, that this policy looks forward to a permanent dependence of the United States upon England for her ships. The only slight attempt that the Senator made to rebut the conclusion was in the faint hope expressed by him that the repair shops which would grow up on this side of the water might develop into machine shops and ship-yards large enough and numerous enough to construct steam vessels; but throughout the entire argument of the Senator he went upon the presumption, which I repeat he did not even attempt himself to rebut, that his policy looked to a proclaimed and a permanent dependence of this country upon England for a merchant marine. I do not believe the Senate of the United States or the Congress of the United States or the people of the United States are prepared to make that declaration.

It is a fact equally remarkable that for the past twenty-five years—or make it only for the past twenty years, from the beginning of the war to this hour, the Congress of the United States has not done one solitary thing to uphold the navigation interests of the United States. Decay has been observed going on steadily from year to year. The great march forward of our commercial rival of old has been witnessed and everywhere recognized, and the representatives of the people of the United States have sat in their two houses of legislation as dumb as though they could not speak, and have not offered a single remedy or a single aid. And this has gone on until now the Senator from Kentucky rises in his seat and proposes to make a proclamation of perpetual future dependence of this country upon England for such commerce as she may enjoy, holding up as models to us Germany, Italy, and the other European countries that are as absolutely dependent upon Great Britain for what commerce they enjoy as the District of Columbia is for its legislation upon the Congress of the United States.

During these years, in which Congress has not stepped forward to do one thing for the foreign commerce of this country, for all that vast external transportation whose importance the Senator from Kentucky has not exaggerated but has strongly depicted, the same Congress has passed ninety-two acts in aid of internal transportation by rail; has given 200,000,000 acres of the public lands, worth to-day a thousand million dollars in money, and has added $70,000,000 in cash, and yet, I repeat, it has extended the aid of scarcely a single dollar to build up our foreign commerce. An energetic and able man who found a great ocean highway unoccupied, and had the enterprise to put American vessels of the best construction and great power upon it, has been held up to scorn and to reproach because he came to the American Congress and said, "If you will do for this line what the Empire of Brazil will do, I will give you a great line of steamships from New York to Rio Janeiro." The Empire of Brazil had said to this enterprising man, "We will pay you a hundred thousand dollars a year if you will run this line;" and New England Senators, I regret to say, who represent the protective system in this country, said with a quiet complacency, "If Brazil is willing to pay for that, we need not." Brazil has got tired paying all and we paying none. Just as soon as it was found that we would not pay, a combination of English ship-builders said, "We will put on our ships and run that American line off; we will carry the coffee of Brazil to the United States for nothing; we will break down this attempt of the United States to begin a race upon the ocean;" and they have pretty nearly succeeded, while we have looked on with apparent unconcern, and by our indifference favoring the efforts of the English line.

Yet during the whole of Great Britain's mastery of the sea, when she had been seeking every line that could be found on which a steamer could float, she has never put on lines to carry from an American port to any foreign ports, but only to her own. You cannot get a British and South American steamship line except on the triangular system that will go from New York to Liverpool taking breadstuffs or cotton, from Liverpool to Rio Janeiro taking British fabrics, from Rio Janeiro to New York bringing coffee and dye-woods; but when the proposition is made that they shall go back from New York to Rio, they decline because they do not want to interfere with the prosperity of England at home by furnishing transportation to any point for American fabrics in competition with British fabrics. The result is that if this Brazilian line shall be taken off, as in all probability it will if the United States extends no aid, then the letters of the United States, of the merchants of New York and Philadelphia and Baltimore and Boston, will be conveyed to Rio Janeiro via Liverpool and reach that point over two great lines of British steamships.

Mr. President, the frank admission of the honorable Senator from Kentucky took away a large part of the argument which I thought I should have to make, and that was to prove that if the United States to-day is incompetent to compete with Great Britain in the manufacture of iron ships, and if you admit iron ships from Great Britain absolutely free of duty, you will be still more incompetent to do it next year. It takes, in the language of the trade, what is called a great "plant" to build steamships; it takes a large investment of money; it takes large and powerful machinery; it requires the investment of millions to start with; and if in addition to all that has been done abroad to build up English ship-yards we pour into them all the patronage that can come from this country, I should like the honorable Senator from Kentucky or any other Senator to tell me exactly at what point of time it will come to pass that any feeble effort on this side will begin to compete with those great yards. If you abandon it this year because you are unable, you will be far more unable next year, you will be still less able the year ensuing, and every year will add to the monopoly of British power in that respect and to the absolute weakness and prostration of American power in competition. But I will say that the frank admission of the honorable Senator from Kentucky of the future and perpetual dependence upon England removes the necessity of arguing that point. He frankly admits it with all its damaging force.

Mr. President, fas est ab hoste doceri; it is always lawful to be taught by an enemy. Great Britain has been our great commercial rival, and since the first Cunard steamship came into Boston, just about forty years ago, when Great Britain seeing that steam was to play so great and commanding a part in the navigation of the world first made her venture, from that time down to the close of 1878, she had paid from her treasury to aid great steamship lines all over the world a sum exceeding forty million pounds sterling, more than two hundred millions of American dollars. I know it is a favorite argument with those who occupy the position of the honorable Senator from Kentucky that Great Britain started upon this plan and followed it for a long period of years, and afterward abandoned it. Sir, she has never abandoned it. She has only abandoned its extension to those lines that were strong enough to go alone, and the British post-office report for the year 1879 shows that under the despised and ridiculed head of postal aid, to which the honorable Senator from Kentucky was pleased to refer with such sneers, Great Britain paid last year £783,000, well-nigh four million dollars in coin.

France gets her steamships from England. France has adopted the commercial policy which the honorable Senator from Kentucky thinks would be the revival of the American shipping interest; but does France by the mere fact of getting her ships built at Birkenhead or on the Clyde abandon the plan, which has been for thirty years in operation under her government, of aiding her ships? Why, sir, last year France paid 23,000,000 francs—more than four and a half million dollars—to aid her steamship lines. And when the celebrated line of France, the company known as Messageries Imperiale, competed too sharply in the Mediterranean waters after the opening of the Suez Canal, when that great French company competed with the Peninsular and Oriental Company of England and was likely to endanger its supremacy by a sharp rivalry, Great Britain promptly stepped forward and added £100,000 to the Peninsular and Oriental subsidy. That is the way Great Britain has abandoned the idea of aiding her great commercial interests!

Italy, that is hemmed in upon a lake, with a territory that does not touch either of the great oceans, is running up largely in steam-navigation; Italy last year paid 8,000,000 francs; and even Austria, that enjoys but a single seaport on the upper end of the Adriatic, pays $500,000 toward stimulating commercial ventures from Trieste. Now the United States cannot succeed in this great international struggle without adopting exactly the same mode that has achieved victory for France. What is it? It is not to help A B or C D or E F or anybody else by name, neither Mr. John Roach, nor Mr. John Doe nor Mr. Richard Roe, but to make a great and comprehensive policy that shall give to every company a pledge of aid from the Government of so much per mile for such a term of years. Let the American merchants feel that the Government of the United States is behind them. Let the United States take from her Treasury per annum the $4,000,000 that Great Britain is paying as a postscript to her $200,000,000 of investment; let the United States but take $4,000,000 per annum—and that is not a great sum for this opulent country—let that be used as a fund to stimulate any company from any port of the United States to any foreign port, and, without being a prophet or the son of one, I venture to predict that you will see that long deferred, much desired event, the revival of the American merchant marine.

Let us do one thing more where England has pointed the way for us. We have nine navy-yards without a navy. If we will put the expense of those navy-yards into the building up of great private ship-yards, it will form subsidy enough if that hated word shall not offend the delicate ears of my friend from Kentucky; it will afford aid enough, if that be more to his taste; it will give help enough, in conjunction with the saving on the construction of naval vessels, to float an entire scheme for the revival of American navigation.

We not only withhold our hands from any possible aid to the American merchant marine, but we keep up the shadow of a shell of a navy on the most expensive basis that ever a navy was attempted to be organized in the world. Great Britain I believe never had but three navy-yards. We support nine. Great Britain's navy is really fifteen times as large as ours is nominally.

Mr. President, we have the largest ocean frontage of any country on the globe. We front all continents; we border the two great seas and the greatest of gulfs. We are necessarily by our position in need of a navy.

The honorable Senator from Kentucky has apparently given this subject wide and deep attention, and I should be glad in some subsequent effort of his to be informed, after he has brought this country to a state of absolute dependence for our mercantile marine upon Great Britain, how he proposes to uphold our navy, how he proposes to build the vessels, where he is going to get his ship-carpenters? I do not speak of the sailors; you can get them from outside. How is he going to retain among this people and in this people the very rudimentary art of ship-building for large ocean-going steamers when his policy absolutely forbids the remotest prospect of any vessels being built here?

I do not expect this Congress to do anything; I am not talking with the slightest hope that that will come about. I know it will come some time. I know the scheme of the honorable Senator from Kentucky, even if Congress should adopt it, would disappoint everybody. It would disappoint everybody except the English ship-builder; it would not disappoint him. Yet I venture to say it would not be followed at all as the honorable Senator says by Americans largely investing in British ships; and the reason why I say that is because they can do it to-day without the aid of new law, and yet they do not. The Williams and Guion line, half American, half British, opens just as good an investment, if you are looking at it merely from the money side, as though they were an American registry. The honorable Senator from Kentucky himself has told us that the Philadelphia line is now running one-half British-built vessels. Why not all? He says that money is not sentimental. I agree to it; and if the object of going into navigation is altogether apart from any considerations of national flag or national defense, if that be the sole end and aim, then I remind the honorable Senator from Kentucky that any man who has a thousand or a million dollars to invest can freely invest it in a British bottom, and he would escape much taxation that he would find if he registered in New York or in Boston; and he could in many ways perhaps expedite the gathering of profit unto himself by keeping a British register rather than by accepting one from America.

It opens no possible temptation to a man desiring to invest in navigation to say to him, "you may go abroad, to England, and buy a vessel and bring her to New York and we will allow you to register there at the custom-house, and you may float the American flag." "No, I thank you," the shrewd investor replies. "If I do that I am going to have more taxation than I shall have in Liverpool or Bristol, I prefer to keep the registry over there," just as the Williams & Guion line does. There are gentlemen in New York deriving dividends from that line just as there are gentlemen in Philadelphia deriving dividends from the line there that is partly made up of British vessels. The very moment you disconnect the entire idea of a national marine and the building of it here, the very moment you put it down on the simple basis of dollars and cents, regardless of anything American in it, then there is no temptation whatever, and you offer no extra inducement by saying that the vessel may be registered here, not the slightest in the world, and it would not be done. When the Senator from Kentucky holds up the brilliant prospect that the repair shops might be the germ and the seed of a future marine, he in effect if not by intention abandons all idea of building ships on this side of the water. And I make bold to tell him that in five years there would be such an utter abandonment, not only of investment from this side but of building from this side, that the American marine would have ceased to be; "the house of Braganza would have ceased to govern," as Napoleon said when he marched into Portugal.

This subject, Mr. President, never can be considered intelligently; it never can be decided, as ultimately it must be, without taking into account at the same time the naval establishment of the United States and the mercantile marine of the United States. The naval establishment must be the outgrowth of the mercantile marine, just as it always has been, just as it always will be, and where you have no mercantile marine out of which to grow it, you never will have, and no nation ever has had a naval establishment worthy of the name. As recently as the beginning of the late war the maritime States of this Union were able to offer in that great struggle seven thousand competent officers of the various grades of the volunteer navy, and put on the decks of the blockading fleet seventy thousand American sailors. Now the Senator from Kentucky, and I think justly, said that a great deal had been made or attempted to be made out of a few vessels having been taken by blockade-runners and destroyed, and others frightened into registry abroad, and that many were dating the downfall of the American mercantile marine from that cause, which was one cause, but I quite agree with him that it was not the largest cause, and that it was not by any means the principal cause. I quite agree with him that it was coincident merely.

But another thing happened just about that time of which the commercial world at least has taken great heed. Up to that date steam-vessels had not been good or great freighters. The side-wheel steamer that did business between this country and Europe was not a great carrying vessel; she required too much coal; her engine took up too much space; but right in the midst of our war, by a succession of inventions—partly American and partly British—there was a complete revolution effected in ocean-going steamers, and that revolution, as I have had occasion once before on the floor of the Senate to call attention to, can best be described by stating this formula: that prior to that date a vessel of 3,000 tons on a voyage of given length had to make 2,200 tons allowance for coal and machinery, and only 800 tons for freight, while now it is precisely reversed, and they can take 800 tons only for coal and machinery and 2,200 tons for freight. That is the revolution which Great Britain effected, with the numerous advantages coincident with, and therefore oftentimes confused with, that other cause which prostrated us by reason of the war. But the Senator from Kentucky is correct in stating that the destruction of the vessels, large as it was at the time and grievous as the calamity was to individuals and to the country, was not the great principal cause which brought about the revolution from sailing-vessels to the steam marine.

The carrying capacity of an ocean-going steamer is something very surprising to men who have not examined it. The very first steamer of the Roach line, so called—and they are by no means as large steamers as those of the Cunard and White Star lines between Liverpool and New York—on the very first steamer that went out from New York to Rio, besides an assorted cargo, which in a manifest would seem to be more than could be got into the hold of the vessel, there were rolled into that hold twenty thousand barrels of flour. It seems almost incredible when you think what that would take in the way of railroad freight trains. That would be two hundred car-loads at one hundred barrels to the car, and that was run directly into the hold of that vessel. That is where these vessels have gained so enormously in the carrying trade. It is merely by their huge, prodigious capacity for freight.

It is idle to fight against the inventions of the world; it is idle for us to fold our arms and suppose that wooden vessels are to maintain anything like the importance they have hitherto had in the commerce of the world. I think I understand something of that subject. I have the honor to be from the State that has built more wooden vessels than all the rest of this Union beside, I believe. Within thirty miles of my own residence is a town of only ten thousand people there is the largest wooden ship building place on the globe to-day. I know some little of that subject; and while the days of wooden ships are by no means over, while they will be a great and needful auxiliary in the commerce of the world, yet it is manifest and is proven that the great highways of international commerce, such as the North Atlantic, the West India seas, the route from San Francisco to Asia, that from San Francisco to Melbourne, and in various and sundry and divers other directions, will be occupied, and occupied almost to the exclusion of sailing-vessels, by the ocean steamers. The United States can take a great part in that race; they can take a great part in it just whenever they make up their mind that the instrumentality by which England conquered is the one which we must use; they can take it whenever they make up their minds that a mercantile marine and a naval establishment must grow and go together hand in hand, and that the Congress of the United States is derelict in its duty if it passes another naval appropriation bill without accompanying it in some form with some wise and forecasting provision looking also to the upbuilding of the American merchant marine.

What the honorable Senator from Kentucky was pleased to say in regard to the protective system and its horrible crimes I have no time to answer. The unfortunate venture which was made in the late campaign on that subject had its origin in Kentucky; and if the honorable Senator is putting this as an element to gloss over the remarkable blunder that somehow or other crept into the Cincinnati platform through the agency of a brilliant Kentuckian I have no special desire to reply to him. I concede to him, as I think he will concede to me, that politically it was a blunder, and all the efforts of the distinguished gentleman who ran as the candidate of the democratic party to get back onto the protection platform only ended in making that which was before serious end in a half farce.

Mr. President, I say to the upholders of protection that those who are interested—and the election showed that the overwhelming public opinion of this country is interested in keeping up American manufactures against foreign manufactures—I say to them that cannot be permanently done without building up the commercial marine of this country. And if any of the gibes and taunts that the Senator from Kentucky so freely distributed to the manufacturing interests of the country shall come to the notice of and shall wake up the men in New England and elsewhere who are enjoying the benefits of a protective tariff to the necessity of extending the strong arm of the same Government for the upholding of its commercial marine, then those gibes and taunts will not have been addressed in vain, and I for one shall thank the honorable Senator from Kentucky for that portion of his masterly speech.

Mr. BECK. I only desire to occupy a moment or two, Mr. President, to say that I am glad the presentation I have made of what I thought was best for the country in regard to our commercial marine has called forth the premier of the next administration, and I am glad as well that the two systems are so distinctly indicated in the views presented by each of us.

He has not denied, because he knows it is true, that we have little or no foreign carrying trade now; that it has dwindled since the war from about 30 per cent. then to less than 17 per cent. now; from 75 per cent. in 1860 to less than 17 now. He does not deny the existence of the fact that we are paying to foreign nations $120,000,000 a year to do our work, which goes to build them up because they are doing for us that which we ought to do, and by doing it we would have this money to be spent at home; nor does he deny the fact that we have by treaty and by law given to Belgium, Germany, Norway, Sweden, England, and France the right to carry our goods from our ports and bring their goods to our ports in cheap foreign-built ships, and have thus handicapped our own people so that we cannot do it at all.

He does not deny that the American sailor is now almost unknown upon the sea and that the sixty or seventy thousand sailors we had at the beginning of the war, all of whom we could call into the service of the country, have been transferred to England and other nations, and that we have no means of defense to-day either upon our Pacific or Atlantic or Gulf coast or to protect our great seaboard cities; and he admits that we are furnishing the money to England with which she is paying her eighty or one hundred thousand sailors while we are lying prostrate at her feet. Nor does he deny the fact that in the event of a foreign war or war among foreign nations themselves we should suffer more than any of them by the destruction or detention of our commerce. But his remedy for all these evils is further taxation upon the people. Will he tell us on what he will impose more taxes in order to raise the subsidy money? He cannot by increasing the tariff raise it, and he will not consent to reduce it. He cannot impose it upon any article of internal revenue that I know of without also reducing the receipts.

Mr. President, subsidies mean taxation and nothing else. I propose that we shall lighten burdens; that we shall take off restrictions; that we shall reduce the taxes imposed upon our own laboring people; that we shall endeavor to encourage our manufacturers to send their products to all the nations of the earth, instead of remaining here and loading our workingmen down as they do now; that we shall allow our own people to do what we allow Germany, Norway, England, Sweden, and France to do, and thus trade on equal terms and keep our own money at home.

I have never said one word against Mr. Roach; he is an enterprising citizen; but I deny the policy of subsidizing Mr. Roach's line or any other man's line of ships so as to drive out of the trade to Rio thirty vessels trading from Baltimore, for the meaning of the subsidy to him is to drive out every one of those Baltimore ships, just as it would be upon any stage-line where the Government furnished money to pay all the expenses of a favored set to run off the other stage-lines. Of course the moment those lines were run off the favored one could charge what it pleased when it obtained the monopoly. That is not my idea of the best mode of extending commerce or trade anywhere.

Nor do I propose to interfere with the coastwise trade of the country, which is to-day 60 per cent. of all we have, and is a monopoly absolute, so much so that the ship-builders and ship-owners of Maine and elsewhere, all along our coasts on the Atlantic, the Pacific, and the Gulf, can charge our own people what they please without interference so far as foreign nations are concerned. I am content that they may have it, and 60 per cent. of all we have in the shipping business seems to me to be monopoly enough; even that is all wrong on principle.

But I do insist that without additional taxation, when the object can be accomplished by the removal simply of existing burdens, so as to enable our own people to run ships built abroad but owned by citizens of the United States, commanded by citizens of the United States, officered by citizens of the United States, we ought thus to build up again our once great commercial marine and have again our sixty or seventy thousand sailors that we could call to the defense of the country if any foreign nation ventures to insult us.

I do not propose to answer now any of the political suggestions of the Senator from Maine. I approved the plank, as I always have done, of a tariff for revenue. Mr. Watterson was right; it is true, honest, democratic doctrine. In 1876, when the convention met at Saint Louis, there was a plank in the democratic platform stronger and more earnest than that inserted at Cincinnati in 1880, and we carried the country on it, although we were cheated out of the Presidency. On the question even now, with all the money that could be drawn from the subsidized corporations of the country, whether the Bessemer steel corporations, the national banks, or any other monopoly, the record shows that our candidate, General Hancock, obtained 4,444,313 votes as against 4,437,981 for General Garfield, being a majority of the popular vote for Hancock over Garfield of 6,332, so that the popular condemnation was not against us as the Senator alleges. And I believe to-day that whenever the people of this country understand that the party question is between liberalizing trade and extending commerce on one side and narrowing it down and subsidizing a few men at the expense of all the balance of the people on the other, the majority on our side will become still greater, and the men who are seeking to take money out of the Treasury to put it into the pockets of a few will not find themselves as strong as they think they are. But I will debate these questions hereafter, when the matter is more fully before the Senate. I only repeat now that I hope the country will look at the presentation that I have made and at the counter-proposition made by the Senator from Maine, and I have no fear of the result.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, the Senator from Kentucky has dwelt at considerable length upon the monopoly of the coasting trade which is enjoyed by the United States. He ought to know, and certainly does know, that the United States has been industriously engaged for the last twenty-five years in breaking down the coasting trade. When the United States paid $70,000,000 in constructing a railway across the continent, they took the largest half of the profit of the coasting trade of this country, and the railways that have gone along the coast and up and down in various directions have reduced the coasting trade of this country to a minimum as compared with what it was twenty-five or thirty years ago. So the great nest of commerce which the honorable Senator thinks he leaves in the monopoly of the coasting trade, I desire to inform him, has been removed by the railway system which the Government of the United States has built up with a subsidy ten times as large as that which is now required for the revival of external and foreign commerce.

When the honorable Senator from Kentucky desires the steamships that are to do the traffic of this country to be built abroad, he forgets to tell in the interest of the laboring man what is a well known, widely recognized fact, that if you build a ship worth $500,000, there is only $5,000 of raw material in it, and that $495,000 is labor. So that the Senator from Kentucky proposes legislation that will take this enormous employment of labor to the other side of the ocean, and expend it in foreign countries. He forgets also that every steamship floating from the country that builds her, in whose ship-yards she is repaired, employs as large a number of men on shore as she does at sea. All this labor the honorable Senator proposes to employ on the other side of the ocean. As a plan for adding to the commercial importance and the absolute monopoly of the British marine, the honorable Senator from Kentucky may be trusted to have suggested the most wise and certain cause by which that even could be brought about.

The honorable Senator, in the early part of his remarks, said that out in Kentucky, where they raise and run horses, a man would be considered an idiot to put one hundred and fifty pounds on the back of a race-horse against one that was running with only one hundred and ten. Oh, the Senator from Kentucky does not propose to do that at all. He simply proposes to withdraw the American horse from the race. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, I do not propose to occupy the time of the Senate to any great length, but I am unwilling that the Senator from Kentucky, as a member of the Finance Committee, should present his views and leave the country to suppose that all the Committee on Finance entertained no other notions than those presented by him. I think the people of the Atlantic coast, the ship-builders, will be as much surprised at obtaining information from Kentucky as to ship-building as the Senator from Kansas yesterday was at obtaining information from the East in relation to the Indians.

Mr. President, the Senator from Kentucky proposes a bill here for the introduction of free ships. I do not regard that at present as a practical question. If it shall ever come up as a practical question here in the Senate, I shall hope to take some part in the debate; but I suppose that we should have no more right to introduce a tariff bill in the Senate for free ships than for any other article, or than we would have to introduce a bill for the introduction of mail cars for the carrying of our mails upon our railroads, or the introduction of wagons for the carrying of mails.

I desire to state that the Committee on Finance received a large delegation in relation to this subject, and if I can sift evidence in what the witnesses gave as facts and opinions, I must say that the evidence was overwhelmingly against the idea of having free ships. They almost with one voice declared that they could not run them under the present existing laws if they were to be admitted free.

I agree cordially with the Senator from Kentucky in relation to the amendment of our laws so as to give some aid and favor to the ship-going interests; for instance, in relation to the measurement of a ship. At the present time we measure everything so as to include the quarters of the men, the hold for coal, the space for machinery, and it all has to pay tonnage duties, whereas for foreign ships there is only included the actual space for freight.

But I am also in favor of allowing these ships to have free stores, and also that they shall not be compelled to pay pilotage when they do not require it. I am also in favor of allowing the ownership of vessels to be held in such a way that one man with a fractional share in a ship shall not be held for the debt of the whole, but only to the extent of his interest in the ship.

But I take it that the great obstacle at the present time against our foreign trade is the local taxation. Ships are held to be personal property, and at New York and various other places they are excessively taxed, so that when they are engaged in foreign trade they are unable to compete with foreign ships, which come and go free of such taxes.

Great Britain, to be sure, repealed her navigation laws in 1849, but she had begun the system of subsidies as early as 1841, and she is continuing them down to this day, paying now almost four millions per annum for subsidies. She has thus monopolized the trade. Her ships are on the ocean, and whether they earn much or little they will continue to run; and unless we can give some aid that shall be substantial in its nature it appears to be utterly impossible that we can restore our carrying trade.

I believe nearly all the ship-owners in the country, on the lakes and on the Atlantic coast, have been represented in various conventions, at Cleveland, at Norfolk, at New York, and at Boston; and they almost unanimously condemn the idea of free ships, and have passed resolutions against them. Under such circumstances I think that the owners and builders of ships upon the lakes and upon the Atlantic sea-coast are better entitled to have their opinion heeded than even that of the Senator from Kentucky.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. GARLAND in the chair.) The resolution will lie on the table subject to the call of the Senator from Kentucky.

PUBLIC GROUNDS IN CHICAGO.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask leave at this time to present the views of the minority of the Judiciary Committee on the bill (S. No. 1935) to confirm to the city of Chicago the title to certain public grounds, reported yesterday by my honorable friend from Illinois, [Mr. DAVIS.]

The views of the minority were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. F. KING, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 6527) to grant to the corporate authorities of the city of Council Bluffs, in the State of Iowa, for public uses, a certain lake known as Carr Lake, situated near said city, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

LANDS IN SEVERALTY TO INDIANS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the bill (S. No. 1773) to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians on the various reservations, and to extend the protection of the laws of the States and Territories over the Indians, and for other purposes. It is before the Senate as in Committee on the Whole, and the pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. PLUMB.]

Mr. WINDOM. I ask that the regular order may be informally laid aside for the purpose of taking up the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. COKE. In view of the fact that there is a regular appropriation bill before the Senate ready to be acted upon, I will consent that the unfinished business may be informally laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, the regular order will be laid aside without prejudice for the purpose indicated by the Senator from Minnesota.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 6969) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes.

Mr. WINDOM. Before the Secretary proceeds to read the bill I will make a very brief statement in regard to it. The amount of the estimates for 1882 is $15,022,331.01. The amount appropriated by the act for 1881 is $14,405,787.70. The amount appropriated by this bill as it passed the House is $14,461,037.55. The net amount added by the Senate Committee on Appropriations is $259,750. The total of the bill as reported to the Senate is $14,720,787.55. The bill as reported is therefore less than the estimate by $301,543.46, and it exceeds the amount appropriated by the act for 1881, the current year, by $314,989.85.

The additions made by the Senate Committee on Appropriations to the bill as it passed the House are as follows: increase for Hydro-graphic Office, $5,000; for equipment of vessels, $50,000; for contingent expenses Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting, $5,000; for construction and repair of vessels, $100,000; and for repairs and preservation of steam machinery, $100,000.

The total increase is $260,000, from which there is a reduction of $250. These additions will be explained, if desired, as the reading of the bill progresses; and I ask that the amendments, which are not numerous, may be acted upon as they are reached in order during the reading of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the bill regularly, and the amendments will be acted upon as they are reached.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill. The first amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 52, after the word "interest," to insert "transportation of funds;" so as to read:

For two secretaries, one to the Admiral and one to the Vice-Admiral, clerks to fleet-paymasters, paymasters of vessels, clerks at inspections, navy-yards, and stations, and extra pay to men enlisted under honorable discharge; commission and interest; transportation of funds, exchange and mileage, and for the payment of any such officers as may be in service, either upon the active or retired list, during the year ending June 30, 1882, in excess of the numbers for each class provided for in this act, and for any increase of pay arising from different duty, as the needs of the service may require, $486,725.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 135, under the head of "Bureau of Navigation," to increase the appropriation "for drawing, engraving, purchase of chart paper, and printing and photolithographing charts, correcting old plates, preparing and publishing sailing directions, and other hydrographic information," from $40,000 to $45,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting," in line 212, to increase the appropriation "for equipment of vessels: for coal for steamers and ships' use, including expenses of transportation; storage and handling; hemp, wire, and other materials for the manufacture of rope; hides, cordage, canvas, leather; iron for manufacture of cables, anchors, galleys, and chains; furniture, wood, hose, bake-ovens, and cooking-stoves; boat-detaching apparatus; life-rafts for monitors; heating apparatus for receiving-ships; and for the payment of labor in equiping vessels and manufacture of equipment articles in the several navy-yards," from $800,000 to $850,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 225, to increase the appropriation "for contingent expenses of the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting, namely: for expenses of recruiting and fitting up receiving-ships; extra expenses of training-ships; freight and transportation of equipment stores; transportation of enlisted men and boys; printing, advertising, telegraphing; books and models; stationery; express charges; internal alterations, fixtures, and appliances in equipment-buildings at the several navy-yards; foreign postage; car-tickets, ferriage, ice; apprehension of deserters; assistance to vessels in distress; continuous-service certificates and good-conduct badges for enlisted men, including purchase of school-books for training-ships and extra medals for boys," from $55,000 to $60,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Bureau of Construction and Repair," in line 325, to increase the appropriation "for preservation of vessels on the stocks and in ordinary; purchase of materials and stores of all kinds; labor in navy-yards and on foreign stations; preservation of materials; purchase of tools; wear, tear, and repair of vessels afloat, and for general care and protection of the Navy in the line of construction and repair; and incidental expenses, namely, advertising and foreign postage," from $1,500,000 to $1,600,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary read the following proviso from line 326 to line 329, inclusive:

That $150,000 of this amount shall be immediately available for the purpose of converting the ships Brooklyn and Lancaster into flag-ships.

Mr. WINDOM. At that point I should like to submit an amendment. I move to insert the words "repairing and," so as to read "for the purpose of repairing and converting." I think the mere expense of converting them into flag-ships ought not to cost very much money; but it is for repairing and converting into flag-ships.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "Bureau of Steam Engineering," in line 340, to increase the appropriation "for repairs and preservation of machinery and boilers in vessels on the stocks and in ordinary; purchase and preservation of all materials and stores; and patent rights, purchase, fitting, and repair of machinery and tools in the navy-yards and stations; wear, tear, and repair of machinery and boilers of naval vessels; incidental expenses, such as foreign postages, telegrams, advertising, freight, photographing, books, and instruments," from $800,000 to $900,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after the word "dollars," in line 341, to insert:

Provided, That $75,000 of this amount shall be immediately available for the purpose of converting the ships Brooklyn and Lancaster into flag-ships.

Mr. WINDOM. I desire to move the same amendment in that proviso. Before the word "converting," in line 343, I move to insert "repairing and," so as to read "repairing and converting."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill. The next amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "Marine Corps," in line 507, after "California," to strike out "and for two private horses for commanding officer at the same place, seven hundred and fifty," and insert "five hundred;" so as to make the clause read:

For forage for three public horses, one for messenger to commandant and staff, Washington, District of Columbia, and two for general use at marine barracks, Mare Island, California, $500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I offer as an amendment to this bill the following section, and I will state that it is in the language of a bill which I introduced in the Senate and had referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and it meets with their approval:

SEC. 2. That sections 1418, 1419, and 1420 of the Revised Statutes relating to enlistments of marines in the naval service be, and hereby are, amended by striking out the word "sixteen" and inserting in its stead the word "fourteen."

Mr. WINDOM. I have no objection to this amendment. I understand it is approved by the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Will the Senator state what it means?

Mr. WINDOM. It simply means to admit boys to the training-school at fourteen instead of sixteen years of age, which I understand is approved by the Naval Committee.

Mr. BURNSIDE. With the approval of their parents.

Mr. WINDOM. I have no objection to it if the Naval Committee thinks it is important. Of course it is subject to the rule and can only be admitted by unanimous consent.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. If the Senator from Minnesota has examined it and believes it to be right I have no objection, but from the reading of the amendment I could not say whether it was proper or not. I take it, though, as it comes from the Committee on Naval Affairs and the Senator who has charge of the bill has examined it and approves it, it is right, though I do not know anything about it myself.

Mr. WINDOM. It does not require much examination. It is a mere question as to whether the boys should be admitted at fourteen or sixteen.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It is a mere question whether a boy shall enter the marine service at fourteen, instead of sixteen as the law now stands.

Mr. BURNSIDE. The naval service.

Mr. WINDOM. That is all there is in it. It is subject to the rule if any one chooses to raise the point; but I do not feel like raising the point of order.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

INTEREST ON THREE-SIXTY-FIVE LOAN.

Mr. ALLISON. I now ask to call up the deficiency bill relating to the interest on the 3.65 bonds of the District of Columbia, reported this morning.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 7029) to provide for a deficiency in the appropriation for interest on the 3.65 loan of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881, and for other purposes.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 6527) to grant to the corporate authorities of the city of Council Bluffs, in the State of Iowa, for public uses a certain lake known as Carr Lake, situated near said city, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

HOTEL AT FORTRESS MONROE.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1843) to authorize the Secretary of War to grant the use of certain land at Fortress Monroe, Virginia, for the erection of a hotel. I am sure there will be no objection to it.

Mr. ROLLINS. Is it the purpose of the Senator to ask the immediate consideration of this bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the motion.

Mr. ROLLINS. I shall object to its consideration at the present time. I want to make some inquiries in reference to it.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I can answer any inquiries now if the Senator wants to make them.

Mr. ROLLINS. I want to examine the matter before I give my consent to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire object to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. ROLLINS. Yes, sir.

CHANGE OF NAME OF A BANK.

Mr. PLATT. I ask the Senate to take up for consideration Senate bill No. 1905, which is a bill changing the name of a national bank in the city where I reside. It will only take the time required to read it, I presume.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 1905) changing the name of the First National Bank of West Meriden, in the county of New Haven, and State of Connecticut.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

STEAMSHIP DESSOUG.

Mr. KERNAN. I ask the consent of the Senate to take up the joint resolution (S. R. No. 143) authorizing the inspection and issue of an American register to the Egyptian steamship Dessoug. It is only to change the name of the ship, owned by Americans, which brought over the obelisk. I think, if Senators will hear the joint resolution read, there will be no objection to it. It was reported, I believe unanimously, by the Committee on Commerce.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. R. No. 143) authorizing the inspection and issue of an American register to the Egyptian steamship Dessoug.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FORT LEAVENWORTH MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 159) to provide for the sale of certain portions of the Fort Leavenworth military reservation.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to authorize the Secretary of War to sell to the Kansas Central Railway Company (a corporation created under the laws of the State of Kansas) all that portion of the Fort Leavenworth military reservation which lies east of the wagon-road between Leavenworth City and Fort Leavenworth and south of Corral Creek, and also a tract lying north of Corral Creek and east of the Government corrals, being a piece of land extending 1,250 feet north from Corral Creek and 1,500 feet east from the Government corrals, and containing, in all, about one hundred and thirty-four acres.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to ask the Senator from Kansas why it is that this land is to be sold to a particular railroad company?

Mr. PLUMB. In 1868 Congress granted a right of way to such railroad companies as might build through the reservation. There are two railroads: the Rock Island is one and the Kansas Central railroad is the other. The land to be taken is land which is not necessary for reservation purposes at all, and cannot be used by reason of the fact of its being greatly depressed and in the break, so to speak, of the ravine up which the railroad runs.

Mr. ALLISON. I happen to know from information that there are two railroads occupying this reservation.

Mr. PLUMB. Yes.

Mr. ALLISON. The proposition of the bill is to sell to one of them to the exclusion of the other. For aught I know this may be all right enough, but it seems to me that if these two railroad companies desire to occupy that reservation or a portion of it they ought to have an equal opportunity.

Mr. PLUMB. But there is an arrangement made or understanding between the companies that their rights shall not interfere. The Senator will notice that the right of the other railroad company is preserved in the last part of the first section, and also in the last section. There is no controversy of that kind whatever. It has been entirely understood between them, so far as their occupancy there is concerned, and the bill will preserve equally the rights of both.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, with an amendment, which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 2, after line 6, it is proposed to insert "and if said survey and appraisement shall be approved by the Secretary of War, then;" so as to read:

The Secretary of War shall appoint three commissioned officers of the United States Army, who shall cause an accurate survey and map to be made of the said lands, and shall appraise their value; a report of which appraisement, accompanied by a map and description of said lands, shall be made by said commissioners to the Secretary of War, and if said survey and appraisement shall be approved by the Secretary of War, then, upon the payment into the Treasury of the amount of such appraisement within eighteen months from the date of the report of said commissioners, a patent shall issue to the said Kansas Central Railway Company, or its assigns, for the lands described in the report of the said commissioners.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NIAGARA RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask, as this seems a convenient opportunity, that the Senate take up and act upon Senate bill No. 2096, reported from the Committee on Commerce. I cannot think there will be any objection to it.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 2096) to authorize the construction and maintenance of a railway bridge across the Niagara River.

Mr. CONKLING. The committee report an amendment, an additional section reserving the power of Congress to control the matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add:

SEC. 3. That the right to alter or amend this act so as to prevent or remove all material obstructions to the navigation of the said river by the construction of the said bridge, is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOTEL AT FORTRESS MONROE.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1843) to authorize the Secretary of War to grant the use of certain land at Fortress Monroe, Virginia, for the erection of a hotel.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is that the bill which was objected to just now?

Mr. JOHNSTON. Yes; but the objection is withdrawn, I understand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the bill for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate as in Committe of the Whole.

Mr. WHYTE. Whenever any part of the public land adjacent to a fortification has been granted for private use, it has been usual to make application to the War Department, so that Congress may be informed whether the application, if granted, would injure the purposes and uses to which the fortification may be devoted. I should like to know, therefore, before the bill is proceeded with, whether there is any recommendation from the War Department in favor of making the use that is proposed of this strip of land in front of the fort at Fortress Monroe.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I cannot state that the Secretary of War has been consulted on this subject. I do not know whether he has been; but the bill itself puts the whole matter under the control of the War Department.

Mr. LOGAN. I suggest to the Senator from Virginia to let the Clerk read the bill again.

Mr. WINDOM. Before the proceedings go further, I ask if the bill is liable to objection now?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is before the Senate regularly, and open to amendment.

Mr. WHYTE. The question I did not understand as having been put to the Senate, because I certainly should have objected. I did not understand that objection was asked and that the bill was before the Senate, because I rose immediately after it was read and inquired whether there was any recommendation, for I think it is essential that there should be some recommendation before a bill of that character should pass.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask for the reading of the bill.

The Chief Clerk again read the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As there seems to be a misunderstanding as to the order of the Senate, the Chair will now ask if there is objection to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. INGALLS. The rule relative to an objection to the consideration of a bill applies only to bills in the morning hour under the Anthony resolution. This bill is moved by the Senator from Virginia, and a majority of the Senate can take it up if they please.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is true, but the Chair dispensed with the regular order of a motion and simply submitted the question if there was no objection to its consideration.

Mr. LOGAN. The bill is reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, and, as understood by the committee, without the matter having been referred to the Secretary of War and without a report from him, but a provision was put in the bill that the whole thing should be done under his supervision; that he might lease this property or not, as he saw proper; so that it would be a matter for him to investigate, and if the Department thought it was a proper thing to do it could be done. It is a mere authority given to the Secretary of War for that purpose and nothing more. He has entire power given to him in the bill, which covers the point suggested by the Senator from Maryland in reference to the information that should be obtained from him. It is entirely in his hands to allow the erection of the buildings, or to displace the buildings at any time when he sees proper if they shall have become inconvenient to the officers in command at the fort.

That is the object of the bill, and all that is in it so far as that point is concerned. The bill was considered by the Committee on Military Affairs, and I was authorized to report it with an amendment, which is now in the printed bill, substituting for the word "grant" the word "lease;" and there was no discussion about it. It is a matter that is left entirely in the discretion of the Secretary of War, and there was no objection to it in committee on that ground.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, I do not think the Senator from Illinois has worded his discretionary clause so as to apply to the permission to use the ground. The buildings while being erected are to have the approval as to their construction of the Secretary of War, and they are to be removed in case he finds they are injurious, I suppose, to the public interest; but the authority to grant the use of the property has no guard about it whatever.

Mr. LOGAN. It is a mere authority given to the Secretary. It does not require him to do it.

Mr. WHYTE. But I think the Senator from Illinois knows pretty well that the grant of an authority to any officer of the Government is generally presumed to be a direction, and it requires a good deal of backbone to resist the application which comes to the War Department after such an authority is granted without limitation. Now I shall make no objection to this bill if after the word "authorized" the words are inserted "if he shall deem the public interest will not be injured thereby."

Mr. JOHNSTON. There is no objection whatever to that.

Mr. WHYTE. Then I will make no objection to the bill.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator referred to what had been incorporated in the bill, and said that it did not strike him as being sufficient to satisfy his judgment. I did not draft the bill, nor did I incorporate anything in it except the word "lease," which struck me as sufficient; and it so appeared to the committee. I have no charge of the bill. I have nothing to do with it except that it was referred to me by the committee and I reported it. That was all I had to do with it except to insert that amendment by the consent of the committee. I know nothing about it further than that; but if I had charge of the bill I would say that I could see no objection to the Senator's suggestion, because I do not think it changes it a particle.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I think the bill means that now, but I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. McMILLAN. I know nothing about the premises embraced in this bill; but I think as a matter of prudence a bill of this kind should be submitted to the Secretary of War in the first instance. The Department knows all that will affect the buildings owned by the Government at that place; we do not; and if the Department had inspected this bill and given to the Senate its opinion approving the contents of the bill, then we could readily pass it without hesitation. The bill itself it seems to me is imperfect. For instance, in addition to the clause to which attention has been called by the Senator from Maryland, the last proviso reads:

And provided further, That said buildings or improvements shall be removable at the pleasure of the Secretary of War whenever, in his judgment, the public interests may require it.

But that does not imply that the Government shall not pay for the expense of removing these buildings. The Government may remove them if the public interest require it, but it may pay for them also. I think that we should have a little more time, and that the Department should have an opportunity of inspecting this matter and giving to us its deliberate opinion upon it. I hope the Senator from Virginia will not press the bill at this time.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I should be very unwilling to press anything unduly; but really I can inform the Senator from Minnesota that there was a hotel erected on the same place before the war, by permission of the Secretary of War, and as I understand it, without undertaking to speak by authority, this measure is desired by the officers in command there.

Mr. INGALLS. Is this an enlargement of the Hygeia Hotel or a rival structure?

Mr. JOHNSTON. It is to be another hotel. There is one hotel there, which is insufficient. This is the fact about that. In addition to the convenience of the officers there, which is to be regarded, it should be borne in mind that this point has got to be a sort of sanitarium. It is a place where invalids from the North going to Florida rest in the fall and in the spring. It is a place of great public resort. The present hotel there is entirely inadequate to the travel. It is desired for the accommodation of the officers there and the public. As certain classes of invalids go from the North to Florida every year and return, they do not desire to go directly to Florida, but make stopping points—go first to Fortress Monroe, then to South Carolina, and then to Florida, and return the same way. In the fall and spring seasons this place is crowded with invalids. The present hotel accommodations are entirely inadequate, and this measure, I understand, is entirely agreeable to the officers in command there and is desired by them. It is put under the control of the Secretary of War, to prescribe the plan, to have general control of the whole matter. He can refuse to execute this bill if he chooses, after we pass it, because he is authorized to do so on the face of the bill and by the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland. It is a waste of time, therefore, to refer it to him now. He can refuse to execute it after it is passed, if he chooses to do so.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to say but a word inasmuch as the bill came from the committee through my hands representing it. I cannot see, for the life of me, why it would not be just as easy to amend this bill, if it needs amendment, right here as to postpone it. As I said before I know nothing about it and care nothing about it except that it seems to me to be a fair bill, and one that certainly cannot injure the public. I have been to Fortress Monroe and I know that another good hotel there would be no disadvantage to the public. I am satisfied of that. There is one occupying a part of the grounds there and why there should not be another I cannot understand. I do not see any good reason for it.

So far as the objection that is made in a legal point of view to the right of the Government is concerned, I have but little to say. We have of course in a great body like this experts in the law who can always find objections. If these Senators will examine bills that have passed heretofore giving the same kind of authority they will find that this bill is literally copied from bills that have passed heretofore. I know it is a very easy matter for us always to find out some reason why a bill should not pass, or to suggest that a bill should read a little different from what it does, on the principle that a great many people dislike the Bible because they did not write it themselves, and we find that objection very frequently to bills in this Senate Chamber. A bill that a man writes himself is always right, but a bill drafted by somebody else is seldom ever right.

The objections that are made to this bill are such as can readily be obviated by a very slight interpolation in the bill, of a few words, if gentlemen see proper to propose them. I will agree to the amendment suggested by the Senator from Maryland; I would also, as far as I am concerned, if I had charge of the bill, agree to the one suggested by the Senator from Minnesota if it makes it more satisfactory; but he will find by examining the books that authority has been given to the Secretary of War to allow the erection of buildings on the grounds of the Government at quite a number of places heretofore. This bill is almost a literal copy of such laws passed heretofore. I do not think it will take five minutes to amend it and perfect it if gentlemen desire to have it changed in any way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the committee, in line 5, to strike out "grant" and insert "lease."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now will be on the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. WHYTE,] which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. After the word "authorized," in line 5, it is proposed to insert, "if he shall deem that the public interest will not be injured thereby."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McMILLAN. I propose to amend the bill by adding:

And such removal shall be at the expense and cost of the person or persons owning such building and improvements.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I have no objection at all to that.

Mr. LOGAN. Nobody objects to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ASSAY OFFICE AT SAINT LOUIS.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 6025, a bill reported by my colleague, who has charge of it.

The Chief Clerk read the title of the bill (H. R. No. 6025) to establish an assay office in the city of Saint Louis, Missouri.

Mr. ALLISON. Let the bill be read for information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read in full for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill at length.

Mr. CONKLING. What committee reported this bill?

Mr. VEST. The Committee on Mines and Mining.

Mr. CONKLING. Has this bill ever been before the Committee on Finance?

Mr. VEST. No, sir; it came from the Committee on Mines and Mining, because it does not propose to establish a mint but simply an assay office.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator inform me whether any of the acts now on the statute-book, establishing assay offices, have ever come from any committee except the Committee on Finance?

Mr. VEST. I do not know that any of the acts for the establishment of assay offices merely have ever come from that committee. They are generally acts to establish a mint and assay office.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not wish to interfere with the bill of the Senators; but I am quite sure that the assay offices which have been established have been established under legislation coming in each House from the committee called here the Committee on Finance. I do not know whether any members of that committee are attending to this matter or not. Certainly it is not my business to volunteer to interfere with the wish of the Senators from Missouri, but I am quite sure the fact is as I state it.

Mr. VEST. The Senator from New York will permit me to say that the bill was reported some days ago. It is a matter of considerable importance to the city of Saint Louis. When it was reported, I attempted to have it passed at once, but the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] a member of the Committee on Finance, raised the same question now raised by the Senator from New York. I then saw the chairman of the Committee on Finance, and he agreed with me that the bill properly came from the Committee on Mines and Mining. It is not to establish a mint, and is not any branch properly of the duties of the Committee on Finance. It is simply a mining question; and it is not the first bill for such a purpose that has been referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining. There are other bills now under the consideration of the Committee on Mines and Mining.

Mr. CONKLING. Meaning no harm whatever to this bill, I venture to make this remark: if two committees of this body promiscuously and accidentally as the case may be are to have charge, as they will have under the present suggestion, of the matter of establishing assay offices, I feel quite sure it will lead to confusion and contrariety of proceeding in the Senate. Other bills of this sort have been reported by the Committee on Finance. The honorable Senator from Missouri, if I caught his words aright, said that other bills had been sent to his committee, but this is the first bill which has been reported from the Committee on Mines, as far as he knows, and my recollection fortifies him in that impression.

Meaning to make no objection to this bill, not knowing but that it is highly meritorious, I venture to suggest that on any subject, and particularly one of this sort which appeals of course to the emulation and disposition of localities, there should not be a selection of committees, so that one Senator introducing a bill sends it to one committee and another Senator introducing a bill on the same subject sends it to another committee, and thus a double or treble opportunity is given to the bill. It is a rule I believe you, Mr. President, will bear me out in saying, with all well conducted courts that when there has been action by one member of the court in granting or refusing an injunction, an order, or whatever it may be, it is bad practice to go to another and try the experiment there. Such I think should be the parliamentary usage; and if this mode of doing business prevails, if in a given case the Committee on Finance is hostile to the establishment of an assay office the way will be to refer the bill in that instance to the Committee on Mines and Mining. Reversing the illustration, if the Committee on Mines and Mining have indicated that they are opposed to it, or if anybody presumes that they are opposed to it, then the way will be to refer that bill to the other committee, and thus to find some judge of the court who will grant the order although the other judge would not do it.

As I say, I know nothing against the merits of this bill. I do not wish to impede the Senators from Missouri one moment in considering their bill; but I thought as my attention was directed to this point, I ought to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that there seems to be now—unintentionally and inadvertently no doubt—a proceeding which will have the effect of splitting and dividing between two or for aught I know more committees an entire subject which ought to belong to some one.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think there is no trouble about this. This bill legitimately and properly belongs to the Committee on Mines and Mining. We have daily occurrences here where a certain class of cases different by a mere hair from another go to one committee while the others go to another committee. A claim for losses sustained by a postmaster by reason of depredations, as a safe broken open and a robbery committed before he has refunded the money to the Government, goes to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. If he has paid the Government and asks to be indemnified, the usual rule has been to send such claim to the Committee on Claims. We have now before the Finance Committee a series of cases that four years ago were before the Committee on Claims. There is a mere shadow of difference between them, but no exception is taken.

I trust there will be no objection made on this point or in opposition to the bill. It is a just and legitimate bill and has been reported by an appropriate committee. That another committee might have kindred jurisdiction, or very nearly so, cannot interfere with the legitimate jurisdiction of this committee; and so it has been held. The Committee on Finance act upon a certain case; the Senate considers it because it acts upon it. Had that case gone to the Committee on Claims, the Claims Committee would have considered it and the Senate would have entertained their action.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I had no knowledge of the introduction of this measure or of its reference; but the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] did say something to me at the time the bill was brought back into the Senate from the Committee on Mines and Mining with a favorable report.

It is true that heretofore in the usage of this body, so far as I am informed, all matters connected with the minting of money have been sent to the Committee on Finance; but the Senator drew my attention to the fact that this was not a bill to establish a mint, but a bill to establish an office for the reduction of ores of the precious metals into marketable shape, not in the shape of coin. At any time it would have been far from my desire, after any committee had acted on a subject, to take exception to their action, and much more strongly when it would have been a claim for the jurisdiction of a committee of which I happen to be the chairman. If the question had been raised originally on the introduction of the bill, I should have said this bill was germane to that class of bills which are sent exclusively to the Committee on Finance, though I do not know any bill by which we have established an assay office at all within the last ten or twelve years; but as another committee have, without my knowledge, acted upon the bill and reported in favor of it, I thought it would be rather in excess of the courtesy of the Senate and of my own sense of duty for me to have asked that a bill which had been so considered should be recommitted to the Committee on Finance especially when the subject might properly be germane to the duties of the Committee on Mines and Mining. That is all I wish to say.

Of the merits of this bill I know nothing. I take it for granted it has been properly considered by the committee who had it in charge. I merely desired to explain why it was that the Committee on Finance have not charge of this bill, and why it was that I have not claimed for that committee jurisdiction when I heard the bill had been favorably reported by another committee of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection to the present consideration of this bill, it will be regarded as before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not wish to interpose any objection to the consideration of this bill, but I doubt very much the propriety of passing it. It is perfectly apparent to my mind at least that if we pass it at all we should appropriate a larger sum of money than is proposed in the bill. An assay office cannot be established at Saint Louis, or anywhere else, with an appropriation of $10,000. I shall not interpose an objection to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ALLISON. Now I ask that the report of the Director of the Mint be read to the Senate, if there be one.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary informs the Chair that there are no papers or reports accompanying the bill.

Mr. VEST. There was no report with the bill. I have a printed statement about it.

Mr. ALLISON. I only desire to say a word further. If we establish an assay office at Saint Louis, it is manifest that there will be applications for similar establishments at Kansas City, at Omaha, and at Chicago. These are all places where minerals in various forms come, and there seems to me to be no reason why an assay office should be established at Saint Louis that would not apply to all these other cities. The Committee on Finance have had discussions for several years with reference to the location of an additional mint. This assay office will grow into a mint certainly, and in this way the question of another mint in the West will be settled by indirection. I think that is a subject of sufficient importance to be fully and carefully considered by the appropriate committee. If the Senator from Missouri has carefully considered this subject and believes that Saint Louis is the best of all the western cities in which to establish a mint, and that another mint is necessary, then perhaps this bill might as well be passed; but otherwise it seems to me it ought not to be considered at this time.

Mr. VEST. There is a printed report which I cannot put my hands on now, but the facts are substantially these: the head of the mints is favorable to the establishment of this assay office in Saint Louis; and the report shows the necessity for its establishment.

Mr. ALLISON. Do I understand the Senator from Missouri to say that this bill meets the approval of the Director of the Mint?

Mr. VEST. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALLISON. And of the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. VEST. Yes, sir; I so understand.

Mr. ALLISON. If that be true, I shall certainly interpose no objection.

Mr. VEST. The bill passed the House of Representatives without any objection at all and was considered by our committee. We had before us at the time a printed report.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE UTE COMMISSION.

Mr. TELLER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, directed to transmit to the Senate the report of the commission known as the Ute commission, appointed under the act of June 15, 1880.

Mr. TELLER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, directed to transmit to the Senate all correspondence between the Secretary of the Interior and the commission known as the Ute commission; also, all correspondence between the governor of Colorado and the Secretary of the Interior concerning the Ute Indians, since the 15th day of June, 1880.

THE MARINE CORPS.

Mr. McPHERSON. I desire to give notice that I will on Monday next call up the bill (S. No. 1933) to establish and equalize the grades and regulate appointments and promotions in the Marine Corps.

LOUISIANA JUDICIAL DISTRICTS.

Mr. LAMAR. I ask the Senate to proceed to the present consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4050) to divide the State of Louisiana into two judicial districts.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the parishes of Caddo, Bossier, Webster, Claiborne, Union, Morehouse, West Carroll, East Carroll, Madison, Richland, Ouachita, Lincoln, Bienville, Red River, De Soto, Sabine, Winn, Natchitoches, Jackson, Caldwell, Franklin, Tensas, Concordia, Catahoula, Grant, Vernon, Rapides, Avoyelles, Saint Landry, La Fayette, Saint Martin's, Vermillion, Cameron, and Calcasieu, in the State of Louisiana, shall constitute, and is hereby created, the western judicial district in that State; and the district court now existing in Louisiana shall, from and after the passage of this act, be known as the district court for the eastern district of Louisiana, and all the parishes in said State not above named shall belong to said district.

SEC. 2. That all suits not of a local nature in the circuit and district courts against a single defendant, inhabitant of said State, must be brought in the district where he resides, but if there are two or more defendants, residing in different districts, such suits may be brought in either district.

SEC. 3. That all prosecutions for crimes or offenses hereafter committed in either of said districts shall be cognizable within such district, and all prosecutions for crimes or offenses heretofore committed in the district of Louisiana shall be commenced and proceeded with as if this act had not been passed.

SEC. 4. That all civil suits in law or equity which have arisen in the parishes composing said western district, or against persons residing therein, or concerning lands situated therein and now pending, together with all process, writs, recognizances, and records belonging thereto, shall, with the consent of all the parties, be transferred to said western district.

SEC. 5. That there shall be held semi-annually in said district two stated sessions of the district and circuit courts at each of the following places, to wit: At Opelousas, on the first Mondays of January and June; at Alexandria, on the fourth Mondays of January and June; at Shreveport, on the third Mondays of February and July; at Monroe, on the first Mondays of April and October.

SEC. 6. That a person learned in the law shall be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, district judge thereof, with a salary of $3,500 per annum, payable quarterly, and with the same powers and duties of the district judge of the United States for the district of Louisiana as it now exists, and such as are conferred on him or required of him by this act. And the said judge shall appoint a clerk of the district court in the western district, and a clerk of the circuit court for said district shall be appointed in the same manner as other such clerks are appointed, and who shall receive for the services performed by them the same fees and compensation that are allowed to the clerks of such courts holding their sessions in New Orleans, in the same State, and shall be subject in every respect to the same restrictions and responsibilities; and the district and circuit courts for the eastern district of Louisiana shall be held in New Orleans, as heretofore. And it shall be the duty of the clerks of the district and circuit courts of the United States in New Orleans, whenever the courts shall so order, to transmit, by some safe conveyance, or to deliver to the clerks of the courts in the western district, or their order, the original papers in all such cases as properly belong to the court in the western district by the provisions of this act, together with a transcript of the proceedings had therein.

SEC. 7. That the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, be, and hereby is, authorized to appoint one person as marshal and one as district attorney for the said western district of the United States within the State of Louisiana created by this act; and that the terms of appointment and service, together with the duties and responsibilities of the said marshal and district attorney, respectively, for the district aforesaid shall be in all respects the same within their said district as the terms of appointment and services, the duties, and responsibilities of the marshal and district attorney, respectively, of the eastern district of the State of Louisiana.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

THE BRIG GENERAL ARMSTRONG.

Mr. PENDLETON. I ask the Senate to proceed to the present consideration of the bill (S. No. 166) for the relief of the captain, owners, officers, and crew of the late United States private-armed brig General Armstrong, their heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Before that motion is put, the Chair will lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the bill (S. No. 1773) to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians on the various reservations, and to extend the protection of the laws of the States and Territories over the Indians, and for other purposes.

The question is on the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island, that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 15, noes 25.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I should like to have unanimous consent of the Senate to take up a bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is already a bill before the Senate.

Mr. TELLER. It has not been taken up.

Mr. McMILLAN. It has not been taken up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair asked if there was objection to the consideration of the bill and he heard none.

Mr. TELLER. That was before the bill was read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was read by title under an order of the Chair.

Mr. SAUNDERS. What is the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be again reported by the Secretary.

The Chief Clerk again read the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill has been read the third time, and the question is on its passage.

Mr. PLATT. It strikes me that this bill ought not to pass without a little more consideration, at this time. When it was before the Senate on a former occasion there was a discussion about it. It is a claim which dates back to 1814, and there are very many things which may be said in my opinion against the passage of the bill. I do not desire to discuss it at this time, but I think the Senate ought to be informed of the nature and character of the bill.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. President, this bill has been before the Senate during this session and the last. It has been accompanied by a report very carefully prepared, in which reference is made to documents and diplomatic correspondence which give the history of the case. I had supposed that every Senator had made up his mind upon it. Attention was called to it by the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Connecticut at the last session when the bill was up for consideration. I do not desire, unless objections are made to its passage, to consume the time of the Senate in stating the history of the event out of which the claim grew and the diplomatic correspondence which has ensued between the respective governments, because it is quite voluminous, and I should be glad to be spared myself the trouble and to spare the Senate the time of its discussion. If, however, objection is to be made to the bill, I shall feel it my duty to have the report read which lies upon the table of every Senator.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Will the Senator from Ohio object to allowing this bill to go over as the unfinished business until to-morrow? and then Senators will have an opportunity of examining the report.

Mr. PENDLETON. I have no objection to the bill going over to any fixed time.

Mr. BURNSIDE. It can come up as unfinished business to-morrow.

Mr. PENDLETON. I have no desire to detain the Senate with a discussion of it to-night; but I have tried for weeks past to bring this bill before the attention of the Senate, and I will not willingly consent to any course which will result in its indefinite delay.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I say to the Senator from Ohio that when I made my motion to adjourn I thought the bill had been taken up. I did not submit my motion to adjourn with a view to defeating the Senator in having the bill taken up, and I have no objection to its being taken up. I ask that it be taken up to-morrow by common consent immediately after the morning hour.

Mr. PENDLETON. If the bill can be taken up to-morrow or the next day at any fixed hour, I have nothing to say. I do not desire to press it on the attention of the Senate to-night, but I can consent to no course which will displace it.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Then I ask that unanimous consent be given that the bill be taken up to-morrow immediately after the morning hour, and that being done I move an adjournment.

Mr. INGALLS. I must object to any arrangement that will displace what I believe to be, by unanimous consent, the unfinished business for to-morrow; that is, the Indian severalty bill. I have no objection to an assignment being made for the consideration of the Armstrong bill at some day after that has been disposed of.

Mr. PENDLETON. I shall have no objection to an arrangement by which it shall come up immediately after the disposal of the regular order.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Then I make that suggestion.

Mr. McPHERSON. Then I move to take up Senate bill No. 1206.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. McPHERSON. I ask the Senator from Rhode Island to withdraw that motion, because there is a bill reported by his colleague which I wish to have taken up.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. PLATT. I have no desire to delay the consideration of this bill. I thought it was too important a bill to be considered at this late hour in the afternoon. I should like the arrangement now proposed, that it shall follow the Indian severalty bill. I think there can be no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That, the Chair understands, is the understanding of the Senate.

JOHN THORNLEY.

Mr. McPHERSON. I move to take up the bill (S. No. 1206) for the relief of Medical Director John Thornley, United States Navy.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask for the reading of the report in that case.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. ANTHONY February 4, 1880:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of John Thornley, medical director, United States Navy, praying for restoration to his former position in the Navy, beg leave to report as follows:

Dr. Thornley was placed on the retired list June 1, 1861, a board of surgeons having pronounced him unfit for active duty. It seems that the examining board further declared that Mr. Thornley's disability was not incurred in his line of duty as medical director, and at that time Thornley was unable, through force of circumstances, to produce satisfactory evidence to the contrary. At a later period he succeeded in obtaining positive evidence, which had not previously been submitted, that his disability had occurred in the line of duty, and asked to submit the evidence for consideration before a competent tribunal. Upon statement of the facts to Hon. R. W. Thompson, Secretary of the Navy, the matter was referred to the Chief of the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery. Under date of May 15, 1878, the Surgeon-General recommended that Dr. Thornley's case be referred to the retiring board for readjustment.

On the 12th of November, 1878, a medical board was convened at the Navy Department for the further investigation and consideration of such documentary evidence as might be produced by Dr. Thornley. After a careful consideration of all the evidence relating to the origin of the said disability of Dr. Thornley the board reached the conclusion that the disability causing the retirement of Medical Director John Thornley had its origin in the line of duty. This report was approved by Secretary Thompson, and Dr. Thornley's name was ordered on the records of the Department from the 1st of January, 1879.

The Secretary of the Navy further says that, "having been retired upon insufficient evidence as to the origin of his disability, he is of opinion that Dr. Thornley's claim is just and deserving of favorable action of Congress."

In consideration of the above facts the committee report favorably on Dr. Thornley's petition.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask the Senator from New Jersey to let us see the act of March 3, 1873, which I have been unable to find. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to this case. This, it appears, is not the first time this man has been before Congress for relief, and I want to get the history of the case. I ask for the reading of the act referred to in this bill. I cannot find it.

Mr. McPHERSON. I do not know that I can turn precisely to the act itself. But prior to 1873 all naval officers who were retired were retired on the same rate of pay. Officers on furlough received one-half pay, and all officers retired, whether disabled in the line of duty or otherwise, received the same rate of pay. In 1873 an act was passed retiring officers, disabled in the line of duty, on three quarters pay. I think I can turn to it in the Revised Statutes, although I cannot find it now on the moment. That act covered that particular point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am objecting to its further consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator object to the consideration of it?

Mr. COCKRELL. I am not objecting to its being considered; but I am objecting to its passage.

Mr. TELLER. I object, if that will do any good.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Before the Chair puts that motion he will state that the unfinished business is the Indian severalty bill. The Senator from Rhode Island moves that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at four o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 27, 1881.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. There are several gentlemen present asking for recognition on matters which the Chair thinks will not occasion the least discussion.

Mr. SPEER and Mr. COFFROTH demanded the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the morning hour for the call of committees.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. No. 6692) granting a pension to Rebecca Tamsett; and also, from the same committee, adversely, the bill (H. R. No. 6087) granting a pension to John H. Longbottom.

The SPEAKER. The bills will be laid upon the table and the reports printed.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio. In both of these cases the pensions have already been granted by the Department; I therefore ask that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of these bills.

The SPEAKER. The reports being adverse, the bills will be laid upon the table and the reports printed.

ISABEL M'DOWELL.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio, also, from the same committee, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. No. 2910) granting arrears of pension to Isabel McDowell; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

DISBURSEMENT OF APPROPRIATION FOR TENTH CENSUS.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Joint Select Committee on the Census to report back a letter from the Secretary of the Interior asking additional allowance for compensation of the disbursing clerk, who has charge of the disbursement of the census fund, with the recommendation that the allowance asked for be granted, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

It was ordered accordingly.

MAJOR JACOB E. BURBANK.

Mr. DIBRELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back adversely the bill (S. No. 313) for the relief of Major Jacob E. Burbank.

Mr. BROWNE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present the views of the minority in that same case, and ask that it be printed along with the report of the majority, and that the bill be referred to the Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The minority report will be printed with the report of the majority, and the bill, with an adverse recommendation, be placed on the Calendar.

JOHN M. M'CLINTOCK.

Mr. CARLISLE, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (S. No. 142) for the relief of John M. McClintock; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

UNIFORM SYSTEM OF BANKRUPTCY.

Mr. ROBINSON. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, to report to the House certain testimony and arguments on said bill submitted to the committee, and to ask that the same be printed and recommitted.

Mr. MILLS. I wish to ask if it is proper that this argument should be printed at the expense of the Government? I think it is customary whenever gentlemen want to impress any matter upon Congress that they themselves print their argument and lay it before Congress. Here an argument is made in favor of a system of bankruptcy and sent to us, and Congress is asked to print the argument. I do not think that should be done.

Mr. ROBINSON. The gentleman from Texas labors under a misapprehension. The committee gave a hearing, took the testimony, and present it to the House. I am instructed to ask for its printing and recommittal.

Mr. WARNER. That is very commonly done.

Mr. MILLS. The printing of testimony is customary, but not the printing of arguments.

The SPEAKER. This has usually been done for the information of members of committees and of the House. It has been done by the Ways and Means Committee.

The motion of Mr. ROBINSON was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures having been called,

Mr. STEPHENS said: Will the Chair now entertain a motion for the consideration of a report from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures?

The SPEAKER. That cannot be done under this call.

MARGARET J. RYAN.

Mr. MAGINNIS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 4587) for the relief of Margaret J. Ryan; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. MONEY, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reported a bill (H. R. No. 7036) to establish post-routes.

The SPEAKER. This is the bill known as the post-route bill, and it is reported for printing and recommittal.

The bill was read a first and second time, and was recommitted to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. COBB. On page 950 of the RECORD my name is on the list of those who did not vote on a call of the House. I desire to have the RECORD corrected. I was present and answered to my name.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed by the Clerk that the roll-call does not show that the gentleman answered to his name. The gentleman is not recorded as having answered when his name was called.

Mr. COBB. I did answer. I was present at every roll-call and answered.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the gentleman's name will be entered as present. It does not change the result.

Mr. CONGER. It might change the result in some cases.

Mr. COBB. This was simply on a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. It cannot change any result in this case.

Mr. CONGER. I have no objection to the gentleman's name being recorded in the call of the House. To do this, however, might on some question change the result as to the matter of a quorum.

The SPEAKER. It does not do that, and it was for that reason the Chair suggested that the gentleman's name should be recorded.

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SPEER rose.

Mr. COX. Has the call of committees been completed?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. SPEER. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. COX. I rise to a question of privilege. I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to report back a resolution of inquiry.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I have risen for a similar purpose.

Mr. SPEER. I do not mean to yield further than to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I have a similar report to make.

Mr. CONGER. If the business of yesterday, which is so important a business, is next in order, I call for the regular order.

Mr. COX. The gentleman from Georgia has yielded to me.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. COX. I have risen to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. SPEER] on a question of higher privilege.

Mr. COX. The Chair does not know what is my question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does know. It is a resolution of inquiry reported back by the Foreign Affairs Committee.

Mr. COX. I would like to have the resolution read before I am ruled out.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Georgia, who is on the floor for a question of the highest privilege.

Mr. COX. The gentleman from Georgia yielded to me.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Michigan has demanded the regular order.

Mr. COX. Not before the gentleman from Georgia yielded to me.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York would have been recognized if the gentleman from Michigan had not objected.

Mr. COX. Then I shall have to pass this.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will adhere to the rule. The gentleman from Georgia is recognized.

CONTESTED ELECTION—YEATES VS. MARTIN.

Mr. SPEER. I call up the report of the Committee on Elections on the contested-election case of Yeates vs. Martin, first congressional district North Carolina. I ask that the report of the majority of the committee be read.

Mr. KEIFER. Let the report of the minority also be read.

Mr. REAGAN. I wish to inquire of the Chair if it can be insisted on as a right that the reports shall be read?

The SPEAKER. In view of the fact that the House will be called upon to vote on this election case, gentlemen might, perhaps, desire to hear the reports on both sides read.

Mr. CONGER. I am very desirous a question of higher privilege should come before the House.

The SPEAKER. This touches the right of a member to his seat and has been generally considered a question of the highest privilege.

Mr. CONGER. I understood the Chair to state when the other question came up that he could not imagine a question of higher privilege than one affecting the election of the President of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not been asked this morning to recognize any gentleman on that subject.

Mr. CONGER. But at the adjournment yesterday the House was dividing on a proposition connected with that subject.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman in charge of that matter is not pressing it. That is all the Chair knows about it.

Mr. CONGER. If it need any urging from this side of the House to have him press it, I think he can have it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair himself would be inclined to consult with the gentleman and advise him to go on with it, if the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] wants to have the individual opinion of the Chair on the subject.

Mr. SPARKS moved across the Hall toward Mr. CONGER'S seat.

Mr. CONGER. I hope the church militant does not come over to this side for the purpose of provoking a quarrel with me. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPARKS, (returning to his seat.) I simply wanted to suggest to the gentleman that it was hardly senatorial to press this question now. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPEER. In order to save time, I will withdraw the demand for the reading of the majority report.

The SPEAKER. The demand for the reading of the report is withdrawn.

Mr. SPEER. The case of the contestant, Mr. Yeates, has received, and, as I think, has merited the approval of the Committee on Elections. I desire to say in the outset of my remarks, that judging from the statements made on this floor yesterday the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] seems to be under an erroneous impression in regard to the action of the majority of this committee about this report. Literally the gentleman was accurate. All the members of the majority of the Committee on Elections did not affix their names to the majority report; but that was owing to the accidental circumstance that they were not all present when the report was adopted. The report as presented by the majority is approved, and, as I think, earnestly approved, by the majority of the Committee on Elections. I think that it is right and impartial, and that its conclusions are sound in view of the law and the evidence.

I believe that if I can for a little while hold the attention of gentlemen to the consideration of the important matters in this case, I can make it clearly apparent that the contestant is entitled to the seat which is in controversy. It is difficult to argue these contested-election cases here, as they are matters in which general interest is not taken. Therefore I beg leave to invoke the attention of the House to the consideration of the questions here involved.

This contest arises about the election which was held on the 5th day of November, 1878, in the first congressional district of North Carolina. There were three candidates at that election: Mr. Yeates, the democratic candidate; Mr. Martin, the republican candidate; and Mr. Respass, who occupied the position of an independent republican.

After consolidating the votes the returning board of North Carolina, consisting of the governor, the secretary of State, the attorney-general, and two State senators, gave the certificate of election to Mr. Martin, the sitting member, in view of a narrow alleged majority of 51 votes. The Committee on Elections, on examination of the vote and the poll and the returns of the several precincts which it will be necessary for us to consider, have reported that Mr. Yeates should be seated on an evident majority of 156 votes, if one view of the case is taken, and a majority of 92 votes if another view is taken.

The first question to which I desire to call the attention of the House is the action of the county canvassing board in the poll of Providence Township, in the county of Pasquotank. In that township Mr. Yeates received a majority of 39 votes. The election was a fair one; there were no charges of fraud or mismanagement; there were no pretenses of intimidation there. Yet the canvassing board of that county refused to give to Mr. Yeates the 39 majority which had been polled for him in that precinct. They based their refusal upon the ground that the judges of the election at that precinct appointed the registrar to carry up and deliver the returns to the county canvassing board.

The contestee in his brief, page 29 of the record, admits that these 39 votes ought not to be rejected. And the report of the minority of the committee, page 24, admits that this objection is not sufficient to justify the committee in rejecting the return of that township. But the minority insists that while they make that admission the contestee is entitled to a gain somewhere else; that is in Salem Township, which they allege was excluded for the same reason that Providence Township was excluded. Now, the most cursory consideration of the evidence in this case will demonstrate the fact that that conclusion is not warranted.

Mr. KEIFER. It is stated in the record in exactly that way.

Mr. SPEER. If the gentleman will possess himself in patience, he will have full opportunity to reply to me. I think his remark is predicated upon a misunderstanding of what I have said.

Mr. KEIFER. No, sir.

Mr. SPEER. The gentleman states, if I do not misunderstand him, that it is stated in the record that the vote of Salem Township was rejected for the same reason that the vote at Providence Township was rejected.

Mr. KEIFER. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPEER. Now, let us see what the record says. I oppose the record to the statement of the gentleman from Ohio. "The votes, as returned to the board of canvassers from the precincts of Salem and Providence, were not received and counted by the board on account of informality, and therefore not counted in the above statement." What informality? The same informality? Certainly not. It does not say that the vote of Salem Township was rejected for the same informality for which the vote of Providence Township was rejected. The only record on the subject, which I have just read, and which is taken from the certificate of B. F. Overman, the clerk of the board of county canvassers, fails to disclose what the informality was in either precinct. We have to go to the evidence elsewhere in the record to show what the informality was in either case.

When we go to the record evidence in regard to Providence Township, we find that the informality was that the registrar carried up and delivered the returns to the county canvassing board. The minority report itself states that that is not sufficient reason for rejecting the returns. When we go to the evidence in regard to Salem Township, we find a great many points of informality other than that mentioned in connection with Providence Township.

Now, the committee is not asked to reject those votes at Salem Township; 135 votes there had already been rejected by the proper election authorities of North Carolina; and in order to sustain the claim of gentlemen on the other side we are asked to overturn and set aside the action of the authorities of that State, and to do so without any sufficient evidence—indeed, in an entire absence of evidence going to show that that action ought to be set aside.

One point of informality there is this: the evidence of the contestee himself discloses the fact that the polls at Salem precinct were not opened until twelve o'clock in the day, when the law is mandatory that they shall be opened at seven o'clock in the morning; that before they were opened a large number of voters at that precinct had left; that not more than one-half of the vote of the precinct was polled; that there was no registrar appointed; that officers who held the election were not sworn. The evidence discloses all of this informality with regard to Salem Township. Yet gentlemen would assume that the only informality there was identical with the informality at Providence Township.

Mr. Speaker, I have but to refer to the evidence in order to demonstrate that my statement is borne out and sustained. I refer to the evidence of James S. Wilcox on page 56 of the record. He says that he was present at Salem Township and acted as registrar. He is asked who was the regularly appointed registrar for Salem precinct for that election. He says that it was J. S. Lister. He admits that he was appointed registrar by one F. M. Godfrey. He is asked, "What time were the polls opened?" He declares that the polls were not opened until twelve o'clock. He admits that he saw as many as twenty-five or thirty people who were prevented from voting at that precinct because of the failure to open the polls at the hour appointed by law.

A MEMBER. What hour is that?

Mr. SPEER. Seven o'clock in the morning. The polls were not open until twelve o'clock. He is asked whether he was sworn as registrar for Salem precinct at that election; he says he was not. He is asked whether the judges or inspectors of the election were sworn;

he says they were not. He admits that he was not a magistrate or a person authorized to administer an oath.

Now lest it may be thought that this is partisan testimony—the testimony of a democrat in behalf of Mr. Yeates, I call attention to the fact that this witness is a republican. He says:

I was mayor of Elizabeth City for the year 1876; was nominated by the republican party and elected by the votes of both parties. I was county commissioner for two years, from about 1872 to 1874. I was nominated by the republican party and was elected by the votes of both parties. In 1875 I was appointed by the county commissioners sheriff of the county to fill the vacancy of John T. Price, sheriff, and 1876 I was nominated by the republican party for sheriff of the county and was elected.

Q. For whom did you vote for Congress at the November election, 1878?
A. I voted for Joseph J. Martin.

There is the evidence which proves that the informality at Salem precinct was not the same as the informality at Providence precinct. Therefore Mr. Yeates is admittedly entitled to have counted for him the 39 votes which were rejected at Providence Township, and Mr. Martin is not entitled to have counted for him any of the 135 votes rejected at Salem precinct because those votes were properly rejected by the authorities of the State.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to call attention briefly to the law in reference to a failure to open the polls at the time provided by the statute. I read from McCrary on Elections:

The better opinion seems to be, however, that a considerable deviation from the hours fixed by law for keeping open the polls must render the election void. Thus, in Pennsylvania, it has been determined that where the law required the polls to be kept open until ten o'clock and they were closed at eight, the election must be set aside. (Pennsylvania District Election, 2 Parsons, 526.) So also if they be opened at a much later hour than the time prescribed by law.

In summing up the conclusions in view of the authorities on this point, McCrary says:

From all the somewhat conflicting authorities upon this subject the following may be gathered as the governing rules:

If the deviation from the legal hours is great, or even considerable, the presumption will be that it has affected the result and the burden will be upon him who seeks to uphold the election, to show affirmatively that it has not. But if the deviation from the legal hours is but slight, the presumption will be that it has not affected the result, and the burden will be upon him who attacks the validity of the election to show affirmatively the contrary.

Now, if you turn your attention to the evidence you will find that the vote at Salem precinct that year, the polls having been opened at twelve o'clock, was only 193, as against a vote of 434 at the same precinct two years before when the polls were opened at the proper hour. Therefore the authority which I have quoted is entirely opposite. Here the deviation was great—from seven o'clock till twelve o'clock. Five hours of the time allotted to the election were taken away by this culpable negligence or fraudulent conduct on the part of the managers. The poll discloses the fact that a large number of the voters of that precinct were in this way deprived of the privilege of voting.

In view of the authorities it does not matter whether there is a failure to keep the polls open as late as the time fixed by statute, or whether there is a failure to open the polls at the hour fixed by the statute. In either case if the deviation is considerable, the election is vitiated.

Mr. KEIFER. To what authority does the gentleman refer?

Mr. SPEER. I read from Brightly's Election Cases, page 257:

We think that if the fact be as stated in the petition in regard to Corridon township—namely, that the election was not opened until two o'clock p. m. of the day, instead of between six and seven a. m., as required, the return should have been rejected.

Gentlemen on the other side perhaps failed to find this authority; for, if I mistake not, a distinction is drawn in the opinion of the minority of the committee between failure to open the polls in the morning at the appointed time, and failure to keep them open at night so long as is required; but there being no difference in principle the reasoning of the majority of the committee upon this subject is unanswerable. The report of the majority declares:

The soundness of this rule is indisputable, otherwise the door is opened for unmeasured frauds. Suppose, for instance, in a heated election, one party should by accident be prevented from polling its heavy vote until late in the afternoon, how easy would it be for a partisan board of managers to defeat a man who otherwise would be the choice of the people. And, again, by refusing to open the polls at the time fixed by law in the forenoon of election day, and by delaying for three or four hours and systematically challenging the voters, and consuming as much time as possible with each voter, it would be easy to procrastinate, so that the hour of closing the polls should arrive and a large vote remain unpolled.

But, Mr. Speaker, we are not confined to that objection as to the informality of the election at Salem precinct. There were only two inspectors there, while the law of North Carolina is imperative that there shall be four inspectors of election, besides a registrar. The law requires that the inspectors should be sworn. They were not so sworn, but the sheriff, who acted as a mere intruder, presumed, outside of his limited powers, to administer the oath when he had no authority to do so.

The same argument which I have made in reference to the Salem precinct applies to South Mills precinct, which is considered immediately afterward in the report of the majority. At that precinct, as I have stated, there were but two inspectors, when the law required four. The returns were signed and certified by persons who really were not election officers under the laws of North Carolina, and any other citizens present had the same right with them to receive votes and certify and send up the return.

On this subject the evidence is very plain. The evidence of M. N. Sawyer, page 30, discloses he was sheriff of the county, and that he administered the oath to the inspectors:

Q. Did you administer the oath to the inspectors of the polls in South Mills Township on said day?
A. I did to those who were present, but I left the polls at about eleven o'clock, and up to that time there were but two of the regularly appointed inspectors, besides the registrar, at the polls.

John W. Barrington testifies, record, page 31:

Q. Were you at the polls at the time of the opening of the same?
A. I was not, but came down twice to vote, and the polls were not opened, and came the third time and they were opened; when I left here, after coming the second time, I think it was then between nine and ten o'clock, and the polls were not then opened.

He goes on further to say there were but two inspectors holding the election besides the registrar.

The testimony of John E. Spence, found on page 36 of the record, is as follows:

Q. Do you know who were appointed judges or inspectors of the polls at said precinct by the board of justices for said county; and, if so, who of them were present and were qualified at the opening of said polls?
A. I was told by the sheriff that Joseph N. Spence, Wiley N. Gregory, Evan Overton, and James H. Sawyer were appointed inspectors to conduct said election; of these, Joseph N. Spence and Evan Overton were only present.
Q. Were you as registrar, together with those inspectors who were present at the opening of the polls, sworn, as required by law, by any one authorized to administer oaths?
A. I was not sworn at any time nor by any one as registrar.
Q. Were there four inspectors present through the day conducting the election?
A. There was not but three inspectors conducting the election during the day.

Now, sir, when you take into consideration the evidence that the poll at this precinct was not opened until ten o'clock; when you take that together with the other facts I have stated, it is clear the poll at that precinct should have been rejected; and the authority upon that subject is very distinct and pertinent.

I refer to the case of James Jackson against Anthony Wayne, (Contested-Election Cases,) decided in the year 1792. This case came up from Georgia. The law of Georgia required that three magistrates should preside in holding an election, and it was held that a return by three persons, two of whom were not magistrates, was defective. It is superfluous to quote other authorities in support of this position.

It is insisted in reference to this precinct that one of the two inspectors who officiated was drunk, and the report shows by a singular infelicity that gentleman was made the special custodian of the ballot-box.

Bribery also is insisted upon; and on that point it becomes my duty to quote from the testimony of the witness Barrington, page 33 of the record:

Q. Were you told by any one prior to the day of the election that Mr. Kehoe, of the republican executive committee of the State of North Carolina, was going to send down $2,500 for electioneering purposes, and that a portion of that sum would be sent to you?
A. I was. I was told by Joseph J. Martin that Mr. Kehoe was going to send down $2,500 to him (Martin) for electioneering purposes, and that he (Martin) would send some of it to me, and wanted me to do all I could with it in his interest.

But, sir, it is not necessary for the committee to dilate on this evidence. It is clear the polls were not opened in compliance with the law; that the requisite number of inspectors had not officiated; that those who did officiate were not sworn, and that but one-half of the registered vote at that precinct was polled. And on that point let me again cite McCrary, that—

Where the laws required the polls to be kept open until such an hour, and they were closed before that time, and it appeared that a full vote had not been cast, the court held the election to be void, and rejected the return of the precinct.

The court held as follows:

When an election is closed up one or two hours before the time, and it is manifest from the assessment there were numerous citizens who had not voted, and sufficient to have changed the result, we will, on this ground, set the election aside as utterly void.

Here the polls were not opened until three hours after the time provided by law, and here one-half of the registered vote was not polled; and in view of these facts, this authority is in point and is controlling.

Now we come to Hamilton precinct, where the contestee received a majority of 64 votes, and I will limit my argument on this point to reading the report of the committee as applicable thereto:

At Hamilton precinct likewise the contestee received a majority of 64 votes, and the contestant objects to the vote being counted, for the reason that the contestee acted as the registrar of the election. The law of North Carolina (laws of 1876–77, section 5, page 517) is mandatory on this subject. It declares "that no person who is a candidate for any office shall be a registrar, or judge, or inspector of an election." It is impossible for us to conceive of a provision more distinct in its terms or one which is from necessity more mandatory than this. It is conceded by the contestee in his brief that he did for a time act as registrar at this precinct. In the interest of the purity of elections, the committee are compelled to reject the vote of a precinct where a practice so reprehensible has been adopted by the claimant of this honorable and responsible office. No man should be permitted to be judge in his own case or take advantage of his own illegal act. The evidence fails to show that the conduct of Mr. Martin was justifiable, fair, and impartial while acting in this important official character; and even if it should be held that this conduct on the part of the contestee did not of itself vitiate the result of the poll at that precinct, it will be admitted that the contestee, who conducted his own election in this way, must have affirmatively shown that no illegal advantage was taken because of his action.

Mr. HOUSE. I would like to ask the gentleman whether any proof was introduced on that subject?

Mr. SPEER. There was some negative proof introduced by the contestee's witnesses who testified that they did not know of anything illegal; but the committee, or a majority of the committee, were of the opinion that the contestee himself ought to have been and was a competent witness, and could have cleared up any doubt which might have existed; having acted in the capacity of registrar of elections and having discharged some of the duties of that position, the committee deemed that it was obligatory upon him to exonerate himself from any imputation of unfairness which might from that state of affairs have rested in the minds of the committee.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SPEER. Yes, sir.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Is not that raising rather a strong presumption against a party who might not know anything of the rules of evidence?

Mr. SPEER. I will state in reply to the gentleman that the contestee in this case is a distinguished lawyer of the State of North Carolina. He has been district attorney of that State, and it would be certainly a violent presumption to conclude that the gentleman did not know the rules of evidence sufficiently well to enable him to determine the fact whether or not he might be permitted to testify under such circumstances.

Mr. HUMPHREY. That may be very true, but it was hardly proper, it seems to me, for the gentleman to volunteer himself as a ready or willing witness. In my judgment it would have been proper, and eminently proper, for the committee, aware of the fact which is stated by the gentleman from Georgia, to have called him before them as a witness in a case of that kind.

Mr. SPEER. I am not aware of any principle of evidence existent in North Carolina or existent here which would prevent a gentleman from testifying in a contested-election case in his own behalf, or which requires the committee to manage his case for him. If there is such a principle of evidence I have never met with it in my reading.

We now come to Vandemere. At this precinct the polls were not opened until after eleven o'clock, or over four hours after the time fixed by the law. More than one-third of the voters at that precinct failed to vote, and a large number of them left the polling place before the polls were open under the belief that no election was to be held. There the registrar of election himself admits in his testimony, and though his mind seems to be not over clear on the subject, yet in substance he testifies that he did say there would be no election held there on that day because of the lateness of the hour. Over one-third of the voters at that precinct, as I have stated, did not vote. To apply the rule laid down by the leading authority on elections in this country, Mr. McCrary, which I have quoted to these facts, it was obligatory upon the committee to reject this vote also.

The contestee claims that he is entitled to 108 votes counted for him at the Merry Hill precinct, and in that way to reduce the majority which this investigation has given to Mr. Yeates. This will not be seriously claimed, I apprehend, by any fair judicial mind on the committee, even though it differs with the general conclusion reached by the majority. The reasoning on this subject is unanswerable. The law of North Carolina provides that the ballots shall be on white paper, and may be printed or written or partly written and partly printed, and shall be without device. These tickets contained a device. An attempt has been made to meet the force of this statute by citing the case from Indiana on this same subject. But the reasoning of the report in reply to that is a sufficient refutation of that claim. I will read an extract from it:

> Under the Indiana statute the court say that the statute "does not authorize the inspectors and judges to reject a ballot upon the discovery of such a mark or embellishment at the time of counting out the ballots which could not be seen by the inspectors at the time it was voted." The North Carolina statute is express that the ballots shall be without device, and that if the ticket shall have a device upon it, it shall not be numbered in taking the ballots, but shall be void. This difference in the statutes renders the Indiana decisions inapplicable, and the sole question is, are the words "republican ticket" on the inside of a ballot a device within the meaning of the North Carolina statute. With the policy of the statute we have nothing to do; one purpose of the statute may have been to prevent bystanders from knowing from observation how the voters voted. No statute can altogether prevent this; experts can easily distinguish between different kinds of white papers, and the printing of the ballots of the opposite parties would ordinarily be done at different printing offices with different type and ink, and the arrangement of the names of the persons and of the office, the punctuation, and the place on the ticket of the printed matter would ordinarily be different and apparent to a well-trained eye. The intention of the statute could be easily evaded if it did not also prescribe the size of the ticket and the size of the type, which the North Carolina statute has not done. Still the statute, such as it is, must be enforced, even if some provisions have been omitted that are necessary completely to appreciate its intention.
> Another purpose of the statute may have been to compel, as far as is possible, the voter to select the persons he votes for independently of any contrivances on the ticket calculated to inform or misinform him of the opinions of the persons voted for, because devices are often contrived to mislead. Either way, we think that words prominently printed on a ticket and intended to designate or describe it, and which have a distinct meaning in themselves, such as, if untrue, might mislead the voter, and whether true or untrue would render the ticket easily distinguishable, must be held to be a device within the meaning of the law. (McCrary on Elections, § 401.) These votes were rejected by the State authorities, and we think rightfully.

Nor, Mr. Speaker, does the report of the minority of the committee controvert that position? That report was prepared, I may be permitted to say, by the hand of a gentleman distinguished for his legal acumen, his knowledge of precedents and authorities, a gentleman who has just been honored by an elevation to the supreme court of a State which has honored itself in the selection made; I refer to the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. FIELD.] That gentleman in his minority report does not differ from the views of the majority of the committee in reference to this matter. He says:

> These votes were rejected by the State authorities and were not included in Mr. Martin's returned plurality. We leave to the consideration of the House whether these votes should now be counted for Mr. Martin or not.

Sir, that is not a very decided denial coming from such strong stalwart authority. The gentleman, with the report of the majority of the committee before him, is silent upon that subject.

Mr. CHALMERS. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SPEER. Yes, sir.

Mr. CHALMERS. I desire to ask the gentleman by whom that portion of the majority report was prepared which is printed in small type?

Mr. SPEER. I am not at liberty to disclose that fact.

Mr. CHALMERS. I ask if that was not prepared by the same gentleman to whom he has just referred? I have a copy of a report said to have been prepared by him, and that portion now appearing in the majority report in small type appears in that copy of the minority report, and my information was that the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FIELD] had prepared it. I desire to know if that is true or not.

Mr. SPEER. Nothing, Mr. Speaker, can be inferred from my remarks that will lead to the conclusion that the gentleman from Massachusetts has devoted any portion of his time to the preparation of any other papers save the minority report printed by order of the House. To that alone my remarks have been directed. It is sufficient for the purposes of my argument for me to say that that report does not controvert the argument as made by the majority of the committee. And in itself that fact should be sufficient to satisfy any impartial judicial mind within the sound of my voice that the position as taken by the majority of the committee is sound and unanswerable.

We now come down, sir, to a precinct which rejoices in the euphonious name of Goose Nest. Here Mr. Martin claims that the action of the authorities of North Carolina should again be set aside, and that 154 votes should be counted for him. On what is that claim based? It is based upon the evidence of one W. A. Johnson, a swift witness—I may be permitted to say one of the swiftest witnesses whose testimony I have ever had the privilege of examining, either before this committee or elsewhere. What does W. A. Johnson say? Mr. Johnson says in his testimony that he stood by and saw 154 voters come up to vote for Mr. Martin; he inspected every one of their ballots; he knew that all of those 154 voters would vote for Mr. Martin; and they were rejected by the board of inspectors of that election.

Now I say on that subject that Johnson's testimony is not credible. Why? G. C. Lamb, the register of deeds of that county where that precinct is located, is called. He testifies taking the list in his hand which Johnson has established and verified by his remarkable evidence; he compares it with the registration list. When we take the testimony of Mr. Johnson we find Mr. Johnson says all these names so refused were called from the registration books of said precinct at the times those voters presented themselves to vote. We turn to Mr. Lamb's testimony. He compares the registration book of Goose Nest precinct with that list as given by the testimony of Mr. Johnson, and they do not correspond. That evidence affords a very material difference.

What is the conclusion? Mr. Johnson, whose evidence is the only evidence on which the contestee bases his claim that the action of a board consisting of two republicans and two democrats shall be set aside, that gentleman has willfully sworn falsely to a material fact. Well, what is the legal conclusion? False in one thing false in all. A witness who swears falsely to a material fact cannot be credited at all. That rule of evidence is applicable everywhere; it is applicable in every court in every State of this Union, and it is applicable on the floor of this House.

Now, sir, I invoke another rule of evidence as applicable to that precinct. It was incumbent on Mr. Martin to provide the best evidence of which the nature of the case would admit. Where are these 154 voters? Why were they not called? Not one of them was called as a witness. Where were they? They were there in that precinct, all residents there; yet not one of these men was brought up to testify that his vote was illegally rejected by that board and that if he had not been rejected he would have voted for Mr. Martin. The committee, therefore, in view of that failure of evidence do not think they are justified in overturning the action of the board of the judges of election in that county, and giving Mr. Martin 154 votes on the testimony, the unsupported testimony, of this swift witness, W. A. Johnson.

Now, sir, why were any votes rejected at that precinct? They were rejected because they were registered in another precinct, and because when these persons went to vote at Goose Nest precinct they did not comply with the law of North Carolina that they should furnish evidence that their registration was changed to that precinct in order to make their votes valid. They came up without complying with the law. That law had been made public. It was recognized by every voter who did vote. Every man whose vote was rejected was rejected because of a failure to comply with that law. This law was construed by the board of managers both in receiving the votes and in consolidating the returns for that county. These managers were equally republicans and democrats; and yet the committee is called upon to set aside the action of that board upon the unsupported testimony of W. A. Johnson. The committee declines to do it.

To sum up the argument: this gives Mr. Yeates 39 votes which were illegally taken from him in Providence Township, and which the contestee admits were illegally taken. It deprives Mr. Martin of the illegal votes in the precincts I have mentioned wherever they have been demonstrated to have been illegal by the evidence under the law. It refuses to support his monstrous claims for 135 votes in Merry Hill precinct and 154 at Goose Nest precinct. And an easy calculation will give an honest majority of 156 votes to Mr. Yeates, and he therefore is entitled to his seat.

In conclusion I desire to say for myself that I have not looked at this evidence in any partisan light. No gentleman on the floor of this House can truthfully accuse me of being a partisan. On every question that has come before the Committee on Elections where the rights of republicans were proven and demonstrated by the law and the evidence my vote is uniformly recorded for them. On the Donnelly-Washburn case I voted as I thought was right. On the Mason-Duffy case, on the Loring-Boynton case, on the Bisbee-Hull case, on the McCabe-Orth case, and on the Iowa cases my votes have been everywhere recorded according to what I thought was right and proper in behalf of the republicans.

In this case I think the right is with Mr. Yeates. Independent in all things, I desire to maintain that right, and I declare that under the law and the evidence he is entitled to his seat as a member of this House.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to say that two hours will be yielded to gentlemen on the other side, to be controlled by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. FIELD.]

Mr. KEIFER. What is the suggestion of the gentleman?

Mr. SPRINGER. It is that two hours will now be yielded to gentlemen on the other side, to be controlled by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. FIELD.]

Mr. KEIFER. By whom will it be yielded?

Mr. SPRINGER. By this side of the House.

Mr. KEIFER. By you?

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman had better first obtain the two hours to yield. He has one hour which he can take care of himself.

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not understand the remark of the gentleman. To what does he refer?

Mr. KEIFER. My remark is that the gentleman from Illinois does not control the time of this House.

Mr. SPRINGER. If the gentleman does not desire any time I will move the previous question.

Mr. KEIFER. I say that the gentleman does not control the time of this House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. STEVENSON.) The Chair will say that this discussion is entirely out of order. The present occupant of the chair has not been advised of any agreement in regard to the time to be occupied in the discussion of this case.

Mr. KEIFER. When this matter closed yesterday—if the Chair will look to the record of the proceedings of yesterday he will discover that the Speaker of the House then in the chair said that no arrangement at all had been made in regard to the time to be occupied in the consideration of this case.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have not said that any arrangement was made.

Mr. KEIFER. Then by what rule does the gentleman from Illinois rise in his place and say "we will now yield two hours to the other side?"

Mr. SPRINGER. I think the uniform rule in matters of this kind has been that the committee reporting in any case controls the debate on it in the House. That has been the rule ever since I have been a member of this House. We have now taken nearly one hour on this side of the question. In order that the other side may have a fair opportunity to be heard, I have stated to them that they might now proceed for two hours to argue this case. What will take place after that I have not presumed to state and will not now state.

Mr. KEIFER. If I understand the gentleman——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will give way for a moment. The Chair is advised that no arrangement was made on yesterday in regard to the time to be occupied in the discussion of this case. The Chair will therefore recognize the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] as entitled to the floor.

Mr. KEIFER. I do not ask to be recognized at this time; other gentlemen are entitled to preference in that respect.

Mr. SPEER. I think the remark of the chairman of the Committee on Elections [Mr. SPRINGER] was simply in accordance with the custom heretofore followed in this House of allowing the discussion to alternate between the different sides of the House. We on this side have now occupied an hour, and if gentlemen on the other side choose to do so they can take two hours, and then we will take an hour. That statement was made without any view of closing the debate.

Mr. KEIFER. I suppose that is what was meant by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER.]

Mr. McMAHON. I think the remark of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] amounts to a notice to the other side of the House that after three hours further debate he will take the floor and call the previous question on this case. There is nothing unusual in that, and it is only fair to the other side of the House that such notice should be given. It is no effort to control the time for debate, because if the House at the end of that time does not want to proceed to vote upon this case, all it has to do is to vote down the demand for the previous question. I think the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] has been in this House long enough to know that such has been the practice.

Mr. KEIFER. I understood the remark of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] in the same way in which my colleague [Mr. McMAHON] puts it. I can only say that he was unfortunate in his manner of expression.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. This debate is out of order and I object to it.

Mr. SPRINGER. It is in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FIELD] as entitled to the floor for one hour.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have a right to explain my position. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FIELD] stated yesterday that four hours would be a fair time for the discussion of this case. I believe that at this late stage of the session the House would be doing injustice to itself and to the other business before it by consuming a longer time than four hours in the discussion of this case. With the view of terminating the debate within that time, I made the announcement that I did when I first arose. I believe it is fair; gentlemen on the other side must admit it to be fair; and upon the fairness and impartiality of that statement I stand.

Mr. FIELD. Mr. Speaker, I stated yesterday that my personal opinion was that four hours before the calling of the previous question and one hour afterward—the whole time to be equally divided between the persons holding opposite opinions—would be, in the state of business before the House, a reasonable time for this debate, but that I could not bind this side of the House if objection was made; and objection was made. I therefore take the floor for one hour in my own right, under the recognition of the Chair.

This election in North Carolina was, speaking in general terms, a fair and honest election. If any gentlemen have any imagination that there was intimidation, violence, or fraud in the general conduct of that election, they are mistaken. The conduct of the people, the conduct of the election officers, the conduct of the candidates, speaking in general terms, has been honest, fair, and in every respect commendable. It is therefore an election contest to be determined without any feeling whatever derived from extraneous sources—to be determined by a careful examination of the facts and the law.

Now a few general considerations. It is not disputed by anybody that Mr. Martin received a plurality of the votes actually cast. It is not disputed by anybody that Mr. Martin received a plurality of the votes actually returned and canvassed, and found by the election authorities of the State of North Carolina to be entitled to be counted and returned for him. It is not contended that any person voted at that election who was not entitled to vote. Therefore there are no fraudulent votes to be deducted on either side. It is not contended that any person entitled to vote was refused the right to vote, except in the case of Goose Nest precinct, where from 120 to 150 voters for Mr. Martin were for reasons which I shall hereafter explain excluded. It is contended that 39 more votes than were returned for Mr. Yeates were cast and should be counted for him. This is all the addition that anybody contends should be made to Mr. Yeates's returned votes. But if these 39 votes be added to his returned vote, they do not elect him. It is contended that Mr. Yeates has suffered somewhat by delay in opening the polls in certain precincts. The reasons of that delay and its effect upon the election I shall discuss hereafter; but if all the injury that Mr. Yeates proves that he received from that delay be allowed in his favor, if all the votes of all the persons who would have voted for him but for that delay be added to his vote, this does not elect him.

Therefore, to elect Mr. Yeates, deductions must be made from votes actually cast for Mr. Martin—actually returned, actually canvassed, and actually counted for him—not a deduction of votes of voters who were not entitled to vote, but a throwing out of whole precincts in which Mr. Martin had a majority, by reason of some alleged informality in holding the election or in the appointment or qualification of the officers of the election or some delay in opening the polls. Now, the main ground upon which this is attempted to be done is in consequence of a delay in opening the polls in certain precincts. The effect of this delay was not in any precinct to make the time of the election so short that all persons who desired to vote could not do so; for in every case where there was delay there was ample time for everybody to vote who desired to vote; and everybody who desired to vote did vote. There is no case in which the polls were closed too soon. In every case it was a delay in opening the polls; and this delay in every case was occasioned by a conformity, or attempted conformity, to the laws of North Carolina. It was not an arbitrary delay, but a delay necessary to comply with the laws of that State.

Now, in general terms the laws of North Carolina in reference to this subject are these: the board of justices of the peace of the county appoint a registrar, who is the presiding officer of the election. This board of justices of the peace also appoint four judges of election, two of whom shall be of a different political party from the registrar. If the registrar refuses or neglects to attend on the morning of election, then the board of justices of the peace of the township appoint a registrar; and if the judges of election refuse or neglect to attend on the day of election, the registrar appoints the judges. In every case in which this delay occurred it happened that either the regularly appointed registrar was not present or all of the judges were not present, and some delay was inevitably occasioned by getting the board of justices of the peace together to appoint a registrar, or some delay was occasioned by the registrar appointing from the voters judges of election to serve in the place of those who were absent. In every case where the delay occurred there was no abandonment of the election; it was a continuous attempt to get the board of election officers full and to go on with the election. In every case in which a person left before this board was organized, he knew, or might have known, that the attempt was going forward to hold the election, and that in all probability the attempt would be successful and an election would be held, and as these are all small country precincts, that ample time and to spare would be given to every man to vote who desired to vote.

Now, in the first place, before I consider this election in its details, I must call attention to a few considerations of public policy. If it be held by this House that in North Carolina, whose laws provide for the filling of vacancies in the election officers on the day of election, which must necessarily take some time, it being implied that the time necessary to fill such vacancies shall be taken on that day, for it cannot be done beforehand—if this House holds that delays so occasioned, which work no injury to anybody except by requiring the voters to wait until these vacancies are filled, render the whole election at that precinct void, a temptation is held out to the minority in every precinct to occasion such a delay.

It would be possible under such a holding for a minority in any precinct to occasion a delay by the two judges of that minority being absent, so that in that event the majority, however large, would be altogether thrown out and destroyed. It is not good policy in construing the election laws of a State to so construe them that a minority in any precinct can have it at their own will to destroy the votes of the voters of that precinct, and any such effect ought, if possible, to be avoided.

It is, as has been said, plainly the intention of the laws of North Carolina that there shall be and must be some delay in filling these vacancies, for the laws have made no provision for filling them before the day of election, and it cannot be known until after seven o'clock in the morning of that day whether the regularly appointed officers will appear or not, and therefore delay is contemplated by the law. It is one which the law necessarily implies, and where the delay in opening the polls is nothing more than the law contemplates and where it has worked no injury to anybody except to compel a voter to wait until the vacancies are filled, I say such a delay is in accordance with law and does not at all vitiate the election.

In the third place, in reference to this whole subject of not opening the polls soon enough, or closing the polls too soon, every single case known to me except the case in Pennsylvania, depended upon closing the polls too soon. Every single case which has been decided that I know of, except the case of Pennsylvania, and that is not a decision, because it is held in that case that the specifications of the petition were not sufficient to enable them to consider the question, and so it is mere dictum on a petition not set out in which the laws of the State were entirely different and the reasons for delay not given at all—I say every case known to me in which either an election has been declared void or the vote of the precinct has been thrown out has been when the poll has been closed too soon.

And there is a reason for that. Every voter has the right to suppose that the polls will be kept open until the regular hour of closing, and he has a right to refrain from going to the polls until a reasonable time of that hour, and if he is cut off from voting by reason of the polls closing too soon, he is deprived of a right he has.

But there is no right under the Constitution and laws either of the United States or of North Carolina that a voter shall be able to deposit his vote the moment he goes to the polls. It is enough for him that during the legal hours when the poll must be kept open he has sufficient time and opportunity to deposit his vote. And no case can be shown, I am satisfied, in which under any such circumstances as these the vote of the precinct has been thrown out. And it would be manifestly unjust to everybody to throw it out; and it would occasion injustice and wrong in any election to be held in the State of North Carolina, for some delay in any precinct in which the regularly appointed officers do not appear is inevitable.

Now, Mr. Speaker, having made these general observations, I will ask the House to consider this case in its details. And first I will consider the case of South Mills precinct which has been thrown out by a majority of the committee, and in which Mr. Martin received a plurality of 64 votes.

The law of North Carolina requires the polls shall be opened at seven o'clock and closed by sunset. In this precinct of South Mills the poll was opened at nine and a half or between nine and ten o'clock. The reasons why the polls were not opened earlier are given by the registrar in these words:

> It was not opened earlier, first, because the inspectors were not present; second, there was no one present to qualify them; and, third, we had no house in which to hold the election.

In regard to the house, that does not appear further in the case, and I suppose one was seasonably obtained, but the difficulty of obtaining inspectors, by which is meant judges, and of qualifying them, is the difficulty in this precinct. It ought to be observed that the voters have nothing to do with the appointment of these officers and no control over their appointment. They have nothing to do with the qualification of these officers, and no control over their qualifications. Ordinarily they appear there and find certain persons holding the election with the books. They go up and deposit their ballots and then go off, and suppose, and have a right to suppose, from the appearances that the election is being regularly held.

One moment on what is known as the law of de facto officers and the validity of the acts of de facto officers so far as the public is concerned. In courts of law the acts of de facto officers are valid so far as the public is concerned. The question of de jure right is only examined on some proceeding by the Commonwealth or State to try the title to the office. The de facto officer is one who is in by color of appointment or election, and who is publicly exercising the duties of the office. Any person so found anywhere publicly exercising the duties of an office, apparently in by color of authority, may act upon the application of any other person upon matters within the jurisdiction of the office, and these are valid acts as between strangers. This doctrine has arisen in courts of law where an officer was not sworn or was not sworn according to law, yet his acts are held to be valid. Parties before him, if a judge, cannot know whether he is sworn or not. He is in by color of appointment or an election and publicly exercising the duties of the office, and his public acts, so far as the public are concerned, are valid.

Now, when you come to apply the law of defective appointment or defective qualification to elections of officers, there are many reasons why it should be applied liberally. In a court where the bench and the bar are highly trained in their profession, there may be some reason why a strict compliance with technicalities should be required, and some knowledge or diligence demanded which is not expected of other persons who are not so trained. But in an election you are dealing with a great body of the people, who are voters; you are dealing with all degrees of intelligence, and dealing with persons of all sorts of pursuits, many of whom are not educated in the law, and the object of an election is to obtain an expression of the will of these persons in reference to candidates for office. That is all. And when you have got that, and are satisfied that you have it correctly, fairly, and honestly given, the formality or informality in the absence of fraud in the appointment of the officers who have conducted the election is not a matter of the substance of the election itself, and ought not to invalidate the act of the voter.

There is so much authority of reason for this that it is not worth while to cite any cases.

What, then, are the facts in regard to South Mills precinct? There was a regularly appointed registrar; there were two of the regularly appointed judges of election, and two were absent. Mr. Pritchard was appointed one of the inspectors or judges by the registrar, and did serve for a short time, when Kenneth R. Sawyer took his place and served, as the registrar thought, until the close of the election, but as Sawyer himself has sworn, until a half hour of sundown; and Sawyer is probably correct. There was then a registrar and two inspectors of election present during the whole election, and a third inspector who was present—either Pritchard or Sawyer—until one-half an hour before the close of the polls.

It becomes important to consider as a matter of law if we assume in this case, and it is a concession to the argument of the gentleman from Georgia, that this election was held by only a registrar and two judges. What is the effect of it? They were the regularly appointed registrar and the regularly appointed judges. The statutes of North Carolina make the registrars and judges of election an election board. Section 20 of chapter 275 of the acts of 1876 and 1877, provides that when an election shall be finished the registrars and judges of election, in the presence of such of the electors as may choose to attend, shall open the box, count the ballots, and read aloud the names of persons who shall appear on each ticket. I will read the statute:

> When the election shall be finished, the registrars and judges of election, in presence of such of the electors as may choose to attend, shall open the boxes and count the ballots, reading aloud the names of the persons who shall appear on each ticket; and if there shall be two or more tickets rolled up together, or any ticket shall contain the names of more persons than such elector has a right to vote for, or shall have a device upon it, in either of these cases such tickets shall not be numbered in taking the ballots, but shall be void, and the said counting of votes shall be continued, without adjournment, until completed and the result thereof declared.

There is another section of the statute, which at this moment has escaped me, which provides that the registrar and judges of election shall superintend the election——

Mr. MANNING. If the gentleman will permit me, I will state that he will find it in section 9.

Mr. FIELD. I have before me section 9.

Mr. MANNING. It is about the middle of the section.

Mr. FIELD. I will read section 9. I am very much obliged to the gentleman from Mississippi for calling my attention to it. Section 9 provides:

> That the said judges of election shall attend, &c., and they, together with the registrars for such precinct or township, &c., shall open the polls and superintend the same until the close of the election, &c.

It is then established that the registrar and judges of election shall together constitute a board for opening the polls, superintending the election until its close, and opening the ballot-boxes, and at the end counting the votes.

Now, on general principles of law, when a board is constituted, a majority of that board form a quorum, and can act with the full authority of the board. But in North Carolina it is not left to the general principle of law.

Chapter 108, Battle's Revised Laws of North Carolina, section 2, clause 2, is:

All words purporting to give a joint authority to three or more public officers or other persons shall be construed as giving such authority to a majority of such officers or other persons, unless it shall be otherwise expressly declared in the law giving the authority.

Now, here is a board of five persons to superintend the election, count the ballots, and so forth, three of whom are confessedly present the whole time.

Mr. MANNING. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. FIELD. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANNING. What does the gentleman mean by "and so forth?" He says, superintend the election, count the ballots, and so forth. What act is to be performed by the registrar or judge of election after the ballot is counted? Is it to certify the return?

Mr. FIELD. I understand so. I shall endeavor to speak of that hereafter.

Mr. MANNING. I wish to call the gentleman's attention to his error just there, which I think is an important one. I supposed the gentleman was of that impression; but where he stopped reading from section 9, a moment ago, he will find these words:

They shall keep poll-books, in which shall be entered the name of every person who shall vote, and at the close of the election the judges of election—

Mark you, not the judges of election together with the registrar, but—the judges of election shall certify the same over their proper signatures—

The signatures of the judges—and deposit them with the register of deeds for safe keeping.

Mr. FIELD. That is not the return which goes to the county canvassing officers.

Mr. MANNING. And where is the gentleman's authority for the certificate of the registrar in connection with the judges?

Mr. FIELD. The poll books go to the register of deeds. But so far as South Mills is concerned, it is not one of the issues of this contest that the return was not properly certified to the county canvassing board. There is no such issue in the cause. But in one or two other cases there is a certificate of the precinct officers which I notice is signed by the registrar and the judges of election, from which I inferred that it was the duty, as understood in North Carolina, of the registrar and judges of election to sign those returns.

I also call the attention of the gentleman from Mississippi to section 38 of the same statute, which he read, which is in these words:

Any registrar or judge or judges of election appointed under the provisions of this chapter, or any county canvassers or commissioners or register of deeds, clerk, or sheriff, failing or neglecting to make the returns and perform the duties required of him by this chapter, for the non-performance of which any penalty has been hereinbefore imposed, shall be fined, &c.

That distinctly implies that it is the duty of the registrar as well as of the judges of election to make returns, as well as perform other duties; and the only copy of a precinct return in this case has the name of the registrar as well as of the judge of elections signed to it. Section 8 also makes provision for the registrars and judges acting together in determining challenges. But I have almost forgotten where I was in my argument as to this South Mills precinct.

Mr. MANNING. I shall not interrupt you again.

Mr. FIELD. It was a very kind interruption.

Mr. MANNING. I was about to ask you another question, but shall not press it.

Mr. FIELD. So much, then, for the fact that this election board was not full. There is no suggestion or evidence in the case that the votes were not actually cast as returned; not a particle of evidence; nothing of that kind. It is proposed to throw out this precinct on the ground that the board was not properly constituted.

Mr. CALKINS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FIELD. Yes, sir.

Mr. CALKINS. You have read from Battle's Revised Laws of North Carolina all the words purporting to give a joint authority, &c. Do I understand your position is that a majority of the board having acted the return is therefore good?

Mr. FIELD. Certainly; that they are one board for this business. For certain other purposes it is possible that they are to be distinguished; but they are put together as one board for opening the poll, superintending the election, opening the ballot-boxes, counting the vote, and, as I believe, for making the return of the votes.

Now, the next issue in this precinct—and I am speaking longer, or shall if I go on in this way, than I meant——

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. STEVENSON.) Does the gentleman request that he shall not be interrupted?

Mr. FIELD. I do not make that request. The interruptions have been very kind and only elucidate the case.

The next issue in evidence, for it is not in the notice of contest in this precinct, is that a Mr. Overton, one of the judges, was drunk. There is no testimony that he was drunk. I do not understand the habits of the people of North Carolina very well, and have no reflections to make on the people of that State. But Mr. Overton is not present to defend himself against charges, and I do not wish to go any farther than the evidence.

The testimony is that Mr. Overton was under the influence of spirituous liquors; and that is all the testimony in the case, except the testimony of Mr. Barrington, in regard to whom there is some testimony about his reputation for veracity, which testimony I will read in a moment. Overton seems to have been active in the discharge of his duties so far as you can glean from the testimony. Barrington, in regard to whom there is some dispute about veracity, and who was a partisan of Respass, and who was a mulatto school-teacher, who had more trouble in this election than anybody else, because he was getting up a bolt in the republican party, the only effect of which might be to elect my friend Mr. Yeates, testifies in regard to this matter as follows:

Q. Was the receiver of the ballots so much under the influence of liquor that he was unable to attend to the discharge of his duties at the polls?

A. He staid at the polls, but I think he was too drunk to be fit for business that day.

That is the only place where the word "drunk" occurs.

Q. Do you know that he did not discharge the duties of his office that day?

A. I do not.

Q. Was he in the discharge of his proper duties at the times you were around the polls during the day?

A. He was.

That is the whole of Barrington's statement. So far as Barrington saw him he was in the proper discharge of his duties; that he was too drunk to attend to them is a thought or an imagination of his. And no other person puts it stronger than that he was under the influence of spirituous liquors. But it is plain from the testimony that he was in the performance of his duties actively, so far as you can gather the facts from it, during the day.

Whether it is quite safe in administering the laws of North Carolina to invalidate the acts of the people there because one of the election officers smelt of whisky on election day, I must leave to gentlemen who are more familiar than I am with the public policy of that State. [Laughter.]

The next objection to South Mills precinct in evidence, but not in the notice of contest, is that there was an adjournment for dinner. It has been settled over and over again that in these country districts, where there is ample time and more for everybody to vote, where an adjournment for dinner is sometimes taken and sometimes not—a I fancy it is frequently taken by people who are accustomed to dine in the middle of the day—such adjournments do not invalidate an election.

The next objection in evidence, but not in the notice of contest, is that this Mr. Overton, when they adjourned for dinner, took the ballot-box, locked it, took the key and carried the box to the house of Mr. Spence, who is a democrat, and who was the registrar at that election, and who probably went with Mr. Spence to dinner and put the ballot-box in an unoccupied room of Spence's residence, locked the room, and the ballot-box remained there while they were at dinner for an hour, and then he took the box and carried it back to the place of voting. That was a very reasonable and proper precaution.

Mr. Spence testified:

Q. Do you believe that the ballot-box was safe from interference during the adjournment for dinner?

A. I do.

He also gives this testimony:

Q. Has it not always been customary here to adjourn the voting at noon for dinner?

A. Sometimes they adjourn for dinner and sometimes they do not.

There is no evidence or suggestion in this case that the ballot-box was tampered with in the least particular. That is all there is of South Mills precinct, but it is on these grounds that, although the democratic State authorities of North Carolina counted the vote of that precinct for Mr. Martin, it is here proposed to throw it out and to deduct 64 votes from the returned vote of the sitting member.

The next precinct is Vandemere precinct. These are all small precincts, where everybody knows everybody. In the Vandemere precinct Mr. Yeates received 31 votes and Mr. Martin received 71 votes; the majority for Mr. Martin being 40. Here the polls were not opened until eleven o'clock and fifteen minutes. The reason given was that it took until that time to get enough men from both sides to serve as inspectors of elections. Mr. Holton, the registrar, puts the opening of the polls at near eleven; Mr. Gatlin puts it at eleven o'clock and fifteen minutes. That is the only objection to this poll. What I have said about the delay in opening the polls at South Mills applies to this case.

If it becomes important in any event to determine how many votes Mr. Yeates lost by reason of voters being unwilling to wait until the polls were opened, it may be said that one man supposes about ten or fifteen; another about six; Mr. McCotter says five. Eight witnesses in all are produced who swore that they either left or did not go to the polls under the belief that no election would be held, and that they would have voted for Mr. Yeates.

In regard to the South Mills precinct, so far as I remember, there is no evidence of any particular person who left the polls, or did not go to the polls, and who would have voted for Mr. Yeates, or at most but one such person. Now, if these eight persons in the Vandemere precinct, all the persons in regard to whom there is any definite evidence that Mr. Yeates suffered by reason of the delay in opening the polls, and the one vote at South Mills were added to his vote, still it would not elect him.

The next precinct is Hamilton precinct, in regard to which the charge is made that Mr. Joseph J. Martin acted as registrar in "checking off the names of persons who presented themselves to vote and doing other and like duties of that office." Now as this is a matter which in some respects affects the conduct of the sitting member, I will read the whole evidence in the case, as it is short, so that gentlemen may determine for themselves what he did, whether it affected the election and whether it had any such effect on the election as to vitiate the whole vote. First I read the deposition of Justus Everitt:

JUSTUS EVERITT, being duly sworn, says, in response to the following question in writing:

Q. State whether you were present at the election in Hamilton, in Martin County, North Carolina, on the 5th day of November, 1878, at which election Jesse J. Yeates and Joseph J. Martin were candidates for a seat in the present Congress of the United States, and what acts, if any, the said Martin did in reference to the conducting and managing said election. State fully his acts and conduct at said election.

A. I was there a part of the time, and Mr. Martin was also present and had charge of the registration books, and had charge when I left, which was in a few minutes.

Cross-examined:

Q. What Mr. Martin did, was it done in the presence of the poll-holders?
A. It was.
Q. Did Mr. Martin act corruptly?
A. Not that I know of.

I ought to state that there are poll-books in addition to registration books. The registration books contain the names of those who are registered, and the poll-books contain the names of those who vote. I read next the deposition of J. G. Carraway:

JONATHAN G. CARRAWAY, being duly sworn, says, in response to the following question in writing:

Q. State whether you were present at the election held in Hamilton, in Martin County, North Carolina, on the 5th day of November, 1878, at which election Jesse J. Yeates and Joseph J. Martin were candidates for a seat in the present Congress of the United States, and what acts, if any, the said Martin did in reference to the conducting or managing said election. State fully his acts and conduct at said election.

A. I was present on the day of election spoken of; Mr. Martin was present around the polls, and I saw him check off some of the registered names of voters as they voted; and my impression is that at one time he came around the counter where the judges of election were, and while on the side of the counter where the judges of election were I think he did not check off any names while there; and when he checked off names he was on the side of the counter where the people came up to vote.

Further this deponent saith not.

Cross-examined:

Q. How many names did Mr. Martin check off the poll-book?
A. I can't say positively, but I think he checked off some forty or fifty.
Q. Was the checking off done in the presence of the poll-holders?
A. I think it was, or a majority of them.
Q. Did Mr. Martin act corruptly in checking off the names?
A. Not that I know of.
Q. Who received the votes?
A. W. K. Gladson.
Q. Was any man's name deposited in the box before his name was checked off of the poll-book?
A. None that I know of
Q. Were you one of the judges at said election?
A. I was acting as registrar for Mr. Justus Everitt, who was the legally appointed registrar.
Q. Was the election conducted fairly?
A. So far as I know.
(The counsel for the contestant objects to the above upon the ground that it is going into new matter.)
Q. What party do you belong to?
A. To the national democratic party.
Q. Who did you vote for?
A. I voted for Jesse J. Yeates.
(The counsel for the contestant objects to the two above questions upon the grounds of the first objection, as being immaterial or irrelevant.)
Q. How was the party divided of those votes that was checked off by Mr. Martin?
A. I don't know.

Now the statute of North Carolina provides that no person who is a candidate for any office shall be a registrar, or a judge, or an inspector of elections.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. FIELD. Certainly.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. What excuse did Mr. Martin render for being there and acting in that capacity?

Mr. FIELD. He has not rendered any; he has not testified in the case.

Now, Mr. Martin was not appointed to either of these offices. So far as appears, all the offices—namely that of registrar and those of judges of election—were filled. It seems that Mr. Martin did not act corruptly; that the election was fairly conducted; that he took no part in receiving votes or keeping the poll-book; and there is no evidence that any person was permitted to vote who was not entitled to vote, or that any person entitled to vote was prevented from voting, or that any votes were improperly received or counted, or that Mr. Martin's conduct had any effect whatever upon the election. In the face of this evidence, to throw out the vote of this whole precinct for an act of indiscretion on the part of Mr. Martin would, it seems to me, be extraordinary; and a majority of the committee do not report in favor of throwing it out.

The next question is as to Providence Township. A plurality of 39 votes in that township, cast for Mr. Yeates, were not counted by the county canvassing board, because the registrar, not one of the judges of the election, was sent as a messenger with the returns. By the law one of the judges of the election, which perhaps in this case should not include the registrar, should have been sent as a messenger.

For that reason this return was excluded. I think this House has somewhat larger powers than that board had; and the mere fact that a messenger, even if not authorized by law, was sent with the returns should not, in the absence of any evidence that the returns are incorrect, prevent Mr. Yeates from receiving those votes; and they have been granted to him.

The next precinct is Salem precinct, in which Mr. Martin's plurality was 135. This precinct has not been counted for Mr. Martin; and if he is entitled to receive it he is entitled to receive 135 more votes than have been returned for him. It was alleged that the return of this precinct was rejected on the same ground upon which the return from Providence precinct was rejected, namely, that a registrar instead of a judge of election was the person selected to carry the precinct returns. I did not know until recently that this was disputed. There are other objections to this precinct which I will consider; but I did not understand these others to be the grounds on which the county canvassing board acted. Now, the evidence is not direct, but it is by implication. I read from the testimony of the clerk of the county canvassing board:

Q. State whether you were a member of the county canvassing board for the county of Pasquotank, who canvassed the returns from the several precincts in said county at said election.

A. I was registrar of the election at Salem precinct, and brought the returns of the election from that precinct to the county canvassing board of said county, at the request and by the direction of the poll-inspectors who conducted the same, and claimed the right to act as a member of said returning board, but by a majority vote of the board I was not allowed to do so.

Q. Were you present when said board considered said returns, and do you know what action they took in regard to them?

A. I was present; they proceeded to canvass the returns from Salem precinct, and refused to count them.

Q. State whether there is in your office, as register of deeds for said county, any record of the action of the canvassing board for the county of Pasquotank in reference to the returns from said precinct at said election?

A. Yes. It appears from a book among the records of my office, styled "Election book," which book I now hold in my hand, that the following entry was made on page 47 of the same, headed "Record of an election held for Representative in Congress and senators and representatives in the General Assembly, on Tuesday after the first Monday in November, 1878, in the county of Pasquotank, North Carolina," to wit:

"The votes as returned by the board of canvassers from the precincts of Salem and Providence were not received and counted by the board on account of informality, and therefore not counted in the above statement. Signed, R. F. Overman, clerk board county canvassers."

It will be noticed that Salem and Providence are put together in the same certificate; the same reason is given for the rejection in each case, namely, on account of informality, though the informality is not expressed. The only reason given by the witness why he was excluded from the board, in connection also with the rejection of the Salem return, is, that he as registrar brought the returns. So I think the assertions which have been made heretofore—not in this House but in the argument—are borne out by fair implication from the testimony, that the ground of the rejection of the Salem returns was that an alleged illegal messenger was sent with them in the same manner as in the case of Providence Township.

Besides, it is said in the report, which is called the report of the majority, (although signed with some limitations by only seven members of a committee of fifteen,) that the county canvassing board is a ministerial board; and if so they could not inquire into and determine the other objections to Salem precinct.

Now, another objection to Salem precinct is, that the polls were not opened until twelve o'clock. This was for the same reasons that I have before stated—the difficulty in filling the places of the officers of election who were absent. As to the persons who left during this necessary delay, there is no evidence how they would have voted. There is the statement of one or two witnesses that in their opinion a majority of those persons would have voted for Mr. Martin, but there is no such definite evidence as would enable anybody to determine how they would have voted. It is urged that before the polls were opened some 25 or 30 voters had left; but my contention of law is that these votes in no event should be counted. It was the duty of those voters to remain. It is impossible to ascertain how they would have voted.

Another statement, by way of objection, is that nearly one-half of the entire vote of the precinct was not polled. Now, this was an election for member of Congress alone. The election for State officers had been held in the preceding August. The whole vote throughout the district at this congressional election falls below the vote at the State election. In this precinct more than one-half the vote at the State election was polled, but something less than the vote at that election. So far as you can get at averages, Mr. Martin lost double the number of votes that Mr. Yeates did; but you cannot count votes at an election for members of this House on the theory that at some other election more voters have voted.

The next objection is that no registrar was duly or legally appointed. Now, the fact in this case is (and it shows the necessity for delay under the election laws of North Carolina) that Mr. Lister, who was both justice of the peace and a registrar, was taken sick on the morning of the election; that he sent the registration books by the earliest conveyance to the polls with directions to carry them to Mr. Godfrey, who was the only other justice of the peace of the township, justices of the peace of the township having authority, in case of the illness of the regularly-appointed registrar, to appoint a registrar. Mr. Lister sent the registration books with directions to have them carried to Mr. Godfrey and to have a registrar appointed. That was done; Godfrey appointed Wilcox registrar and Wilcox acted as registrar during the day, an appointment satisfactory to Lister, although he had not previously agreed to it because he did not know of it. And Mr. Wilcox being thus in under color of authority, an unexceptionable man as appears, acted as registrar throughout the day.

It is also said "that other officers of election were not duly appointed or sworn." They were duly enough appointed, I think. The inference is the judges were all regularly appointed, there is no evidence that they were not, and they were sworn by the registrar who, so far as appears, was not authorized to administer an oath. I do not know whether he was or not, but it has been settled over and over again, that whether an election officer is sworn or not, that does not invalidate the election. And there is no doubt suggested whatever that the vote given is not the true vote. Everybody was permitted to vote who was entitled to vote and desired to vote. There was no crowding. There was more than ample time for every one to do so, and I cannot understand on what principle elections can be conducted in North Carolina except on such principles as under these circumstances will render the actual vote cast by legally qualified voters valid votes.

We come next to Merry Hill precinct. In Merry Hill precinct, 108 votes cast for Mr. Martin were thrown out and not counted for him, because they had on them, on the inside at the top of the ticket, the words "republican ticket." These ballots had been procured to be printed by Mr. James B. Martin, an active democratic politician and an active supporter of Mr. Yeates, although Mr. Yeates had nothing to do with it, for the purpose of getting republican voters to cast them and then have them thrown out under the law of North Carolina by the precinct board. It was the trick of an active and unscrupulous politician with whom Mr. Yeates, it is but justice to him to say, had nothing whatever to do.

Gentlemen who agreed with me in committee upon all the other questions in this case differed with me in opinion whether under the laws of North Carolina which are cited in the report those votes should be counted or not counted. I was of the opinion that by the strict law of North Carolina they should not be counted; other gentlemen were of the opinion they should be. The grounds of my objection are very well stated in the report of what is called the majority of the committee. I have nothing further to say about it, but to leave it to the determination of the House.

We come then to Goose Nest precinct, which is the last precinct. From one hundred and twenty to one hundred and fifty voters tendered their ballots for Martin at this precinct, and they were challenged and their ballots rejected. The ground of the rejection was that they had not received a certificate of removal from Hamilton precinct. Goose Nest precinct and Hamilton precinct had been separate precincts until September, 1876. In September, 1876, they were consolidated and made one precinct, the voters voting at Hamilton. August 5, 1878, the precinct of Goose Nest was re-established, separated from Hamilton, and the registrar for Goose Nest appointed, who was required by the board of county commissioners to transfer from the register of votes of Hamilton precinct the names of such registered voters as were residents of Goose Nest precinct, which he did. He thus made up the registration list of Goose Nest precinct, which had been discontinued for a year and eleven months. Monday, the day before the election, although by the law the board had no right to meet on that day, but were bound to meet the preceding Saturday, (see section 8 of the registration laws of North Carolina of 1877,) on Monday that board decided in the afternoon that they would not permit the voters registered in Goose Nest precinct to vote, although they resided in that precinct, had always resided there and were otherwise entitled to vote—unless they obtained certificates of erasure of their names from the Hamilton registrar. This fact was known probably to but a few persons, I do not know to how many. The democratic registrar at Goose Nest rushed over that afternoon to the registrar at Hamilton, got from one to two hundred certificates of erasure from the Hamilton registrar, presumably democratic, brought them to the registrar at Goose Nest, and the fact that a certificate had been obtained was entered on the registration book of Goose Nest; but the majority of republicans knowing nothing of this decision of Monday, knowing their names were on the registration books of Goose Nest, prepared under the authority of the county commissioners, did nothing of the sort. They had no intimation, so far as I know, that any such thing was required. The list of persons who offered to vote for Martin is given. There are two or three witnesses to it. It was compared with both registers. As I have said, at least 120 of them presented their ballots for Mr. Martin next day; but they were challenged and their ballots were rejected.

I have set out in the report the whole matter in regard to Goose Nest, and as I have but two or three minutes left I will say only this, that to obtain new registration the personal oath of the person registering is required; and if the law applied to this condition of things no one of those persons for whom the democratic registrar procured certificates ever personally applied or ever took the oath, and you have between one and two hundred voters of the precinct who, in that case, illegally voted, which renders the legal precinct vote uncertain, and the 132 plurality returned from that precinct for Mr. Yeates could not be counted for him.

And in the second place, and I will not trouble the House to read the law, the requisition of a certificate does not apply at all to the separation of a precinct into two precincts, but only when a man removes from one precinct to another. The law is this:

> And if an elector has previously been admitted to registration in any ward, township, or precinct in the county in which he resides, he shall not be allowed to register again in another ward, precinct, or township in the same county, until he produces a certificate of the registrar of the former township, ward, or precinct, that said elector has removed from said township, ward, or precinct, and that his name has been erased from the registration books of the ward, township, or precinct from which he has removed.

None of these electors had removed from any precinct. They continued to reside at the time of the election where they had previously resided, and the statute referred to has no application to this state of things. Under the view I have taken, if you add to Mr. Martin's returned plurality, i. e., 51, the plurality for him in Salem, i. e., 64, and the rejected votes at Goose Nest, at least 120, and subtract the 39 additional votes given Mr. Yeates at Providence, Mr. Martin's plurality is 267; and if you add the votes for Mr. Martin at Merry Hill which were not counted because they had on them the words "republican ticket," Mr. Martin's plurality is 375. These last are the device votes.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, of course if any gentleman upon the other side of the House desires to be heard, he is entitled to the floor. If not, I shall continue the argument on the same side of the question.

Mr. RUSSELL, of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I would like to be heard on this question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state to the gentleman from North Carolina that although he has assented to his desire to be recognized, the Chair is informed and understands that the custom is to recognize members of the Committee on Elections in preference.

Mr. RUSSELL, of North Carolina. I was promised a portion of the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. FIELD,] who indicated his intention of yielding to me a part of his hour.

Mr. FIELD. When I began my argument it was my intention to speak only forty minutes, but as I was urged by gentlemen around me to go on and take my whole hour I did so. I did promise to give twenty minutes of my time to the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. RUSSELL.]

Mr. KEIFER rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from North Carolina or the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. KEIFER,] in accordance with their desire as they shall arrange between them.

Mr. KEIFER. Then I will proceed at this time.

Mr. Speaker, it has seemed to some gentlemen on this floor, as they indicated a few days ago, that we were considering two cases here as though each were a pure matter of favor. When we were considering the case of Mr. Bisbee of Florida vs. Mr. Hull some gentlemen thought we ought to couple it with this one, because in that case it was proposed to turn out a man who was a democrat and put in a republican, and that we ought as a matter of reparation and by courtesy all agree that we should now turn out a republican and put in a democrat. I wish to say that up to this moment, although I think I have given due consideration to the report of the committee, as well as to the argument of the distinguished gentleman from Georgia—and I will say for him that it is the best argument I think that side of the question is susceptible of—I have learned of no higher or better reason than that for unseating Mr. Martin, and that in my judgment it is proposed here to commit a great outrage upon the gentleman from North Carolina. I would not speak in this way if I did not feel that I was justified by the report of the majority in saying that in every case—every case I believe with the exception of the one where it is claimed that the gentleman from North Carolina himself was guilty of an act of indiscretion in regard to a certain voting precinct—all that is claimed here in effect is that the democrats have contrived at the election held in the several precincts in North Carolina, over which a contest arises, a scheme by which they might fix up a plan for unseating this man and putting another one in his place. We will see if we do not show this as we go along.

I intend to consider this case, I think, as impassionately as possible. It ought to be kept in mind that the election held on the 5th day of November, 1878, was an election for members of Congress in the State of North Carolina, and that it was coupled with no election for any other officer whatever. It was a simple question as to who should be chosen for Representative in Congress, and was not complicated by any State, municipal, or township election. The returning board of North Carolina is composed of the governor, the secretary of State, the attorney-general, and two State senators; the latter appointed by the governor from each of the two parties. The canvass made by this State board gave Mr. Martin his seat by 51 majority. Now, it is conceded, I think, on all hands that the county canvassing board had no right to reject the vote of Providence Township, in Pasquotank County, North Carolina. In that township the contestant received a majority of 39 votes. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that I have saved myself a very great deal of trouble in the consideration of this case over this question as to whose duty it was to bear the returns from the voting places to the county seat. It is claimed—and I do not care whether that is true or false—that a registrar of a voting precinct could not be chosen properly under the laws of the State of North Carolina to carry the returns to the county seat. There is some little difference of opinion on that point, but we bottomed a case a few days ago in which we all were happily united upon this principle, that it matters not what irregularities had taken place from the time the votes were put into the boxes up to the time they came to be considered and counted here in the House, that it matters not what irregularities were shown as to the returns if we had the vote or the returns before us here, which would indisputably show the real vote cast, that it was our duty to count it. That is the law, and has never been disputed, so far as I know, unless in this present case. So it is unnecessary to write long reports or to make long speeches to show that A ought not or that B ought to have carried the returns, if we have the returns here. It is our duty, in fairness to the people and as an act of justice to the man elected, to give him the benefit of the votes cast.

I agree that it was not right to reject the vote of Providence Township, which gave to the contestant 39 majority, simply because the wrong man may have carried the returns to the county seat.

I find in the briefs of counsel for the contestant this same question discussed as to whether it is not the duty of the House on the same ground that we admit this voting precinct to reject Salem precinct in the same county. It is not very clearly shown, I admit, in the certificate that was read by the gentleman from Georgia whether or not these two precincts were rejected by the county board solely on the ground that the right man did not carry up the returns. But it is argued all through the case, and the distinguished gentleman himself in preparing and presenting his report to this House assumes that was the state of things, and says we are not called on in this township to reject that vote—the vote of Salem township—because he says it is already rejected. And that is the summum bonum of all his argument in the report against counting the vote in Salem township, which was rejected on the ground that the right man did not carry the returns to the county seat.

The difficulty about counting that precinct was that it gave a majority of 135 for Mr. Martin, the sitting member. That was the trouble about its being counted. There was no trouble about counting 39 votes for the contestant; there was no difficulty, no legal trouble about that.

But I admit, and I shall come to that as I go along, that there is some question made on another ground as to counting the vote of Salem precinct. But I shall consider that when I consider the same question as applied to other precincts in other counties.

The contestant objects to counting the vote in several precincts because polls were not opened at the proper hour. This objection applies to precincts giving the contestee the majorities following: Salem precinct, Pasquotank County, 135; South Mills precinct, Camden County, 64; Vandemere precinct, Pamlico County, 40. The votes in South Mills and Vandemere were canvassed by the returning boards. The vote in Salem was not canvassed.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the registrar in each of these precincts, J. S. Lester in Salem, John E. Spence in South Mills, and H. C. Holton in Vandemere, were democrats. I may say as a matter of fact that all the registrars in the State of North Carolina were democrats. Now in these three precincts it is claimed that the contestee, the republican, should not be entitled to have counted for him the majorities that were cast for him because, as the facts show, democratic registrars connived, schemed, planned, and arranged so that the polls should not be opened until after the hour of seven o'clock in the morning. They planned it and arranged it and sent democrats through the township saying that they would not open the polls, when in fact they did open the polls after the time fixed by law.

Mr. MANNING. You do not pretend to have any testimony for that?

Mr. KEIFER. Yes sir; and it is democratic testimony, too.

Mr. MANNING. I give notice to the gentleman that I will assert and undertake to maintain that there is not a syllable of proof to justify the criticism he is now pronouncing. And I will show that the gentleman in the statements he is now making is giving way too much to his passion instead of manifesting that impartiality which ought to characterize the discussion of a case like this.

Mr. KEIFER. I will say to the gentleman from Mississippi that I am the mildest mannered man, I trust, and the best tempered man in this House. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANNING. I hope when I take the floor I will not be so reckless of the testimony, as I understand it, as the gentleman from Ohio is now illustrating himself to be.

Mr. KEIFER. That which hurts gentlemen always makes them squeal.

Mr. MANNING. I give you notice that I will make good what I have just stated.

Mr. KEIFER. I have named the men who are the registrars. I am hardly required, in order to satisfy a gentleman who is possessed of an acute, reasoning, logical mind—I am hardly required to go and get some man to swear that these democratic registrars got somebody else to perpetrate this outrage when it was their duty to prevent its being done. Do you want me to call a witness to swear that Holton did not manage Vandemere precinct in Pimlico County so that the polls were not opened until after seven o'clock? Why, he swears he did it himself, if you want that. The gentleman from Mississippi wants the proof. The fact is admitted that all these registrars were democrats. They did call on some men to serve as inspectors, but took pains to call on men who would not serve when there were plenty around who would serve. It is shown that when democrats found the polls were not opened at the hour fixed they scattered off like rats. That is not the language of the witnesses, but the effect of what some of them say. It seems that the democrats only ran off for fear the polls would be opened and they might have a right to vote. Some of them hastened away, according to the proof, after the polls were just about being opened.

Now, who is to blame that these polls were not opened? Not the contestee, but the friends of the contestant. It is proved, I think, to the satisfaction of everybody that these precincts where they did not succeed in getting the polls opened at precisely seven o'clock in the morning were largely republican precincts. No democratic precinct suffered such a hardship. I say that impassionately.

Mr. MANNING. We prefer, I think, to take the conclusion that Mr. FIELD reached. I say that in reply to all which the gentleman states so impassionately.

Mr. KEIFER. There were a few republicans who went away in one place where it was publicly stated that the polls would not be opened. I think gentlemen will want to rely on something more than Mr. FIELD if they expect to satisfy the judgment of this House. Mr. FIELD reaches a conclusion fairly. I wish they would take him in everything. Gentlemen must not assert that his conclusion is in opposition to what I am saying on this question, for it is not.

Mr. MANNING. I do assert it, and the testimony will show it.

Mr. KEIFER. Does the gentleman say that these registrars were not democrats?

Mr. MANNING. That is begging the question; you must live up to your sweeping charge.

Mr. KEIFER. I am willing to yield to any proper question without getting into a mere colloquy. I always yield to gentlemen for proper questions.

Mr. MANNING. I do not want to interrupt you any further.

Mr. KEIFER. I do not want to get into any colloquy about this matter of testimony. It is proper to say that there was a man by the name of Wilcox, who was substituted along in the day in one of these precincts for registrar, and he was not a democrat. He got the polls opened as quickly as he could after he was substituted.

Mr. MANNING. I do not want you to modify what you have said.

Mr. KEIFER. I do not modify it. I say that the registrars who had the duty of opening these polls in every instance were democrats. It is said some of the election officers were not sworn, or if sworn, it was by persons not authorized to administer oaths. The authorities and the argument already made make it clear that this can make no difference. I will not stop to argue that, for if these officers performed their duty and committed no fraud or wrong, they became de facto inspectors and judges of elections, and the election under the law must stand just the same as if they had been de jure officers. In this the whole blame was on the democratic registrars and other officers.

Now, no fraud is shown to have taken place in any of these precincts where they say the polls were not opened in time. None is charged, none is alleged. None of these persons had a right to leave the polls until the registrar and other officers whose duty it was to open the polls had left. And they have no right to complain now that they were not permitted to vote.

There is one of the polling precincts, that of South Mills, where the additional objection is made that a democratic board and a democratic registrar or judge of election by the name of Overton, when they went to dinner, took the ballot-box, locked it up in a room and kept it there, and after they got through dinner took the box back to the voting place and the election went on.

Now, we are asked to decide, and I believe some of the members of the Election Committee hold, that that act ought to destroy the majority which the sitting member received in that precinct. Saying nothing now about any scheme or contrivance, for it may not have been a scheme on the part of the officer in that case, the law is against throwing out that vote. There is a recent case in my own State precisely in point, (19 Ohio St., 25,) and the decision follows the uniform decisions all over the country. In those decisions it is held that unless there was fraud, unless somebody was wronged, unless somebody was prevented from voting, the election should not be declared void. There is no charge of fraud or wrong done in this case.

In Hamilton precinct, Martin County, 64 votes are to be excluded because Mr. Martin, the sitting member, in the presence of the democratic registrar, assisted to check off some of the votes. I repeat that 64 votes are to be excluded from the vote of the sitting member, because a democratic registrar allowed or permitted or requested the sitting member to check off the list some few of the names of those who voted.

Now, the testimony shows that no person was harmed. The testimony affirmatively shows that there was no corruption in that case.

The testimony clearly shows that no man was prevented from voting, that there was no harm done any one, and that there was nothing done by Mr. Martin, as registrar at all, except in one or two instances to act as the hand in striking off votes of the democratic registrar, who was there, and who himself swears that there was no corruption and no harm done.

I understand that only a minority of the Committee on Elections hold that the objection urged on that account is a valid objection. Perhaps it would be well, in order to make the point clear, (for it is an important matter,) to call attention to the testimony in this case upon that point.

I will read all the testimony that has any material bearing on the subject of the alleged misconduct of Mr. Martin. I read first from the testimony of Justus Everitt, who says he was present at the election in Hamilton precinct, Martin County. He further says:

I was there a part of the time, and Mr. Martin was also present and had charge of the registration books, and had charge when I left, which was in a few minutes.

Cross-examined:

Q. What Mr. Martin did, was it done in the presence of the poll-holders?
A. It was.
Q. Did Mr. Martin act corruptly?
A. Not that I know of.

Now I read from the testimony of Jonathan G. Carraway, the democratic registrar. In answer to a question, he says:

I was present on the day of election spoken of; Mr. Martin was present around the polls, and I saw him check off some of the registered names of voters as they voted; and my impression is that at one time he came around the counter where the judges of election were, and while on the side of the counter where the judges of election were I think he did not check off any names while there; and when he checked off names he was on the side of the counter where the people came up to vote.

I read further from his cross-examination:

Q. How many names did Mr. Martin check off the poll-book?
A. I can't say positively, but I think he checked off some forty or fifty.
Q. Was the checking off done in the presence of the poll-holders?
A. I think it was, or a majority of them.
Q. Did Mr. Martin act corruptly in checking off the names?
A. Not that I know of.
Q. Who received the votes?
A. W. K. Gladson.
Q. Was any man's name deposited in the box before his name was checked off of the poll-book?
A. None that I know of.
Q. Were you one of the judges at said election?
A. I was acting as registrar for Mr. Justus Everitt, who was the legally appointed registrar.
Q. Was the election conducted fairly?
A. So far as I know.

(The counsel for the contestant objects to the above upon the ground that it is going into new matter.)

Q. What party do you belong to?
A. To the national democratic party.
Q. Who did you vote for?
A. I voted for Jesse J. Yeates.

That is all the testimony in the record, I think, bearing on this question. So I may leave that point.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if gentlemen feel that I have spoken with some earnestness or even passion on this subject of the exclusion of votes because democratic registrars did not go to the polls in due time, let them reserve their feeling for this next point. In Merry Hill precinct, Bertie County, 108 votes cast for Mr. Martin where thrown out because of an alleged "device" upon the tickets. Now let me state the facts of this matter. A man, said to be a distinguished lawyer of the State of North Carolina, named J. B. Martin, (please do not confound him with J. J. Martin,)—J. B. Martin, a distinguished lawyer and the attorney in this case for Jesse J. Yeates, unblushingly swears that he hired a man by the name of Bond, a democratic printer, to print these tickets which were thrown out, and which we are told are not to be counted. J. B. Martin had them printed with this so-called "device" upon them; he himself, according to his own testimony, distributed them to unsuspecting persons—colored persons and others—and this caused these tickets to be voted; and when he found they were being voted he went and appealed to the judges of election, a majority of them democrats, to throw them out; and they did his bidding!

As soon as this contest came up we find J. B. Martin appearing as the counsel of Jesse J. Yeates in this case; and the majority of the committee say that it would be a righteous thing to purge the ballot-box in this precinct by not allowing these tickets to be counted for Mr. J. J. Martin. If anybody disputes the facts I will prove them from the record. The majority of the committee say that the purity of the ballot-box in North Carolina requires that these tickets with this wonderful "device" upon them should not be counted. Perhaps it would be a good thing to put into the RECORD the testimony of this most unsavory gentleman. It would take too much of my time to read it, but unless there is objection I will print as a part of my remarks the testimony of J. B. Martin himself upon this point, and also the testimony of Mr. Bond, Mr. J. B. Martin being the man who had the tickets printed, who distributed them, who then had them rejected, and Mr. Bond being the man who printed them. Here is the testimony of J. B. Martin:

Q. What is your age and occupation?
A. James B. Martin; age thirty-five; occupation attorney-at-law; resident of Bertie County.
Q. Just previous to the congressional election in 1878 did you have printed some tickets, as follows: "Republican ticket. For Congress, J. J. Martin;" if so who printed them, and how many of them were received by you?
A. I did. I did not receive to exceed one hundred and fifty. Wm. M. Bond, of Edenton, printed them.
Q. Were those received by you prior to the election?
A. I received them night before election.
Q. What did you do with them?
A. A part of them were put in an envelope and directed to Daniel Cooper, and deposited in Nicholls's store, at Merry Hill precinct, in a box, where the public got their mail. I think some of them were placed near the voting place in a box near the polls.
Q. Who directed the envelope?
A. I did.
Q. Who is Daniel Cooper?
A. A negro politician of the republican party.
Q. Was he an active supporter of Mr. J. J. Martin at said election?
A. I presume so, from the fact that he distributed those tickets very rapidly.
Q. Who did you support?
A. Jesse J. Yeates.
Q. Did you and James B. Nicholls put up those tickets in packages at the time and place mentioned?
A. We put them up in one package and directed them to Daniel Cooper.
Q. Who requested you to have those tickets printed?
A. No one.
Q. Is Cooper an ignorant man?
A. I judge he could read from the fact that he examined those tickets and compared them with others.
Q. Was any representation made to Cooper that those tickets were sent by J. J. Martin?
A. No such representation made to him by myself, nor any other person to my knowledge.
Q. Was the envelope containing the tickets stamped with a United States postage-stamp?
A. It was not, to the best of my knowledge and belief.
Q. Were any of these tickets voted at Merry Hill precinct at said election?
A. Tickets similar in appearance were voted at said election—about one hundred and nine, as I am informed. I am not positive as to the number.
Q. Were the said tickets so voted refused to be counted for J. J. Martin, candidate for Congress, at said November election held at Merry Hill precinct, Bertie County, in said congressional election and State?
A. I do not know of my own knowledge.
Q. What is your best information and belief as to that?
A. Basing my answer on hearsay evidence, they were not counted.
Q. By whom were the said tickets thrown out and refused to be counted?
A. I do not know of my own knowledge.
Q. What is your best information and belief on that point?
A. From hearsay testimony, by the judges of election at said precinct, on the ground of device and voting more than one ticket; the device consisting in the words "republican ticket" printed on the said ballot.

(Answer to the two preceding questions objected to on the ground of hearsay.)

Q. What was the political complexion of the board of judges of election?
A. My impression is that J. E. Nicholls, J. H. Brown, T. J. Webb, and James W. Smith were the judges of election, all of whom were democrats, and supported J. J. Yeates for Congress.
Q. Did you not advise the judges of election that these tickets were illegal and should not be counted?
A. I did.
Q. Did you send or give any tickets to D. C. Winston, in form "republican ticket. For Congress, J. J. Martin?"
A. I did.
Q. About how many?
A. About twenty-four.
Q. Is D. C. Winston a resident of Windsor, Bertie County, a lawyer, and a strong supporter of Joseph J. Yeates in said election?
A. He is and was.
Q. Do you know if D. C. Winston received said tickets?
A. I was informed by D. C. Winston that he received them.

Cross-examined:

Q. Did you see any official connected with said November election take any of those tickets, "Republican ticket. For Congress, J. J. Martin," and publicly exhibit them to republican voters, and advise them that said tickets were illegal?
A. I did; Mr. J. C. Freeman, the registrar. My impression is they were so exhibited by him before any of them were voted.

Redirect by counsel of contestee:

Q. Did Mr. Freeman do this at your request?
A. He did not.

Further this deponent saith not.

J. B. MARTIN.

Deposition of William M. Bond.

William M. Bond, a witness on part of the contestee, Joseph J. Martin, being duly sworn, deposes and says:

Q. What is your name, age, and occupation?
A. William M. Bond; age, twenty-one; occupation, newspaper man.
Q. In the fall of 1878 were you editor and manager of the Chowan Gazette, a democratic newspaper published in Edenton, North Carolina?
A. I was.
Q. Do you know James B. Martin, of Merry Hill precinct, Bertie County.
A. Yes.
Q. Was he then and is he now a leading democratic politician in said county?
A. Yes. He was an active democratic politician of that county.
Q. Did he hold any official position in said county at that time?
A. I think he was chief-justice of the inferior court of that county.
Q. Was he, in the congressional election in November, 1878, an active supporter of Jesse J. Yeates?
A. I think he was.
Q. Who were candidates for Congress in the first congressional district of North Carolina in November, 1878?
A. J. J. Yeates, J. J. Martin, J. B. Respass, and I. S. Chamberlain.
Q. Were you, just previous to said election, requested by any one, and, if so, by whom, to print several hundred tickets, of which the one attached is a copy? Please state if the said tickets were printed and delivered or received by any one; and, if so, by whom; and any other facts connected therewith.
A. I was requested by J. B. Martin to print said tickets for him, of which the attached is one. I printed several hundred of them, and sent them to Mr. J. B. Martin, and he stated afterward that he received them.
Q. Were they printed and received prior to the November election, 1878?
A. They were.

(Contestant's counsel declines to cross-examine.)

Further this deponent saith not.

W. M. BOND.

Witness: WM. P. GURLEY.

REPUBLICAN TICKET.
For Congress:
J. J. MARTIN.

The question presented here is whether you shall unseat J. J. Martin because the counsel for Jesse J. Yeates succeeded in getting these votes, which are called fraudulent, cast for J. J. Martin. That is the proposition that gentlemen are invited to come up to. It is said that these tickets were fraudulent because they had a "device" on them. Now was there a "device" on these tickets? What was the form of the ticket? It was a very small ticket, having printed at the top of it the words "Republican ticket," then followed the words "for Congress," then followed the words "J. J. Martin." The ticket was printed upon white paper, and was in every respect in accordance with the law of the State of North Carolina. There was no "device" on it in the proper meaning of the term. It is claimed that the "device" consisted of the words "republican ticket" on the face of the ticket and at the head of it. I refer to the law of North Carolina. From section 18, chapter 275 of the laws of North Carolina of 1875, I read all that has any bearing on this question:

The ballots shall be on white paper and may be printed or written, or partly printed and partly written, and shall be without device.

The question is whether printing on the face of the ticket at its head in ordinary type the words "republican ticket" constitutes a device. What is a device? Let us take the definition as given by Webster, and see whether we find anything indicating that the sacred name "republican" when it precedes the word "ticket" constitutes a "device." A late edition of Webster gives this definition of device:

That which is formed by design or invented; scheme; artifice; artificial contrivance; stratagem; project; generally used in a bad sense.

Worcester gives the same definition. It is a word which had a meaning in heraldry, and it has a well-understood meaning in mechanics. It is a word used sometimes in criminal law. It has no meaning difficult to understand when used in the connection here. It is anything connected with bad. Any scheme, any plan, anything that is intended to operate for evil on the minds of others, might be called a device.

Here is the ordinary ticket such as we find everywhere, and there is nothing in the claim except as it existed in the minds of Martin and his willing tools, the judges down there—J. B. Martin, I mean. There is no decision of any of the courts of North Carolina showing that a heading when printed on the inside of a ticket is a device.

To go into the history of this matter a little, there was a time when they had embellishments, distinguishing marks on the back, especially of tickets in States South, and some of them North, and the Legislatures of those States struck at that sort of thing; that is, the use of those emblems, those distinguishing things, and which it was supposed were the means of intimidating voters. It was supposed they worked harm, and I am told some democrats went so far as to say it was a means by which unlettered whites and blacks were enabled to tell when they were voting the republican ticket. They used to have large tickets with the face of General Grant in every imaginable shape and form upon the back of them, so that if the voter saw any part of the ticket, if a colored man saw the face of that great war hero and statesman, he knew that he was voting the right ticket; he would know that he was voting the right ticket even if he could not read the face of it. Some of this legislation was on the theory that it was wise to prevent this sort of thing. The law may be all right, Mr. Speaker; I am not here quarreling with it, but I am only referring to this to show this legislation was not intended or designed to be a blow at the ordinary ticket, such as is voted everywhere all over the country.

I intended, Mr. Speaker, to give the use in which the word device appears in several places in the Holy Bible, and as it lies before me, I believe I will do it now. Job, speaking of the powers of the Almighty, chapter v, verse 12, says: "He disappointed the devices of the crafty." David, in praising the goodness of God, says, Psalms xxxiii, verse 10: "The Lord bringeth the counsel of the heathen to naught; He maketh the devices of the people of none effect." Paul uses the same word in his second epistle to the Corinthians, chapter ii, verse 11: "Lest Satan should get an advantage of us, for we are not ignorant of his devices." All connect it with bad, with evil. Here it is used in the same sense, although used by legislators in the State of North Carolina.

Now to the authorities for one moment. It is claimed on the part of gentlemen who make the majority report in this case that they were unable to find anything that was satisfactory to themselves except where they gleaned it from a private paper of some other gentleman. I have been a little curious to look at some of the authorities which are cited in that printed paper, and I assert—and I wish while gentlemen are correcting me they would go to this and correct it—I assert that every authority cited in that report which the gentleman adopts and takes home to himself—I assert, sir, that every authority cited on the subject of a device is exactly in the face of the conclusion of this report.

I will invite your attention first to the Indiana case, a case in 35 Indiana, 275. Here, Mr. Speaker, we get the precise question exactly, where the words "republican ticket" were printed on the head of the ballot on the same side where the names of the candidates were printed. The statute of the State of Indiana was much more stringent and severe than the statute of the State of North Carolina. But I will read an extract from it:

SEC. 23. That all ballots which may be cast at any election hereafter held in this State shall be written or printed on plain white paper, without any distinguishing marks or other embellishment thereon, except the name of the candidates and the office for which they are voted for, and inspectors of election shall refuse all ballots offered of any other description: Provided, Nothing herein shall disqualify the voter from writing his own name on the back thereof.

Now, then, the case was exactly like this one. The court said that at the October election in 1870 there were ballots voted for the contestee with the words "republican ticket" printed at the head and on the same side the names of the candidates were printed. That is exactly our case. Then the court goes on to say that "the only question before us is, was this such a distinguishing mark or embellishment as to require the inspectors to refuse the ballots when offered. This question was directly before this court in a former case and was answered in the negative." They say in that decision they fully indorse the case in 29 Indiana, 308. That decision I have before me; and these two cases, I beg you, Mr. Speaker, and gentlemen of this House to note, are cited in the report of the majority as sustaining their claim that if there be printed on the face of the tickets the words "republican ticket" it is a device. Neither of them sustain the conclusion of the report of the committee, and it looks to me as if somebody might have been intending to perpetrate a stupendous joke on the majority of the committee.

But there is another authority cited. Section 401, McCrary on the Law of Elections, has been quoted and we ought to look at that and see how far it supports the claim of gentlemen upon this question. I will read the section referred to:

It has been also held that where the statute provided that all ballots should be written or printed upon white paper without any marks or figures thereon, to distinguish one from another, ballots upon paper tinged with blue, and which had ruled lines, were legal ballots within the meaning of the act.

This case was decided in 15 Illinois, 492:

This ruling, however, went upon the ground that the ruled paper was not used with any intent to violate the statute.

Certainly J. J. Martin did not intend to violate the statute of the State of North Carolina even though J. B. Martin, counsel of Yeates in this case, did intend to commit an outrage upon Mr. J. J. Martin by attempting to unseat him; and the voters of that State did not intend to violate the law.

But I continue reading from McCrary:

It is quite clear that when the statute distinctly declares that ballots having distinguishing marks upon them shall not be received, or shall be rejected, it should be construed as mandatory and not simply directory.

And so it was held by the supreme court of Pennsylvania under a statute of this character, that ballots having an eagle printed thereon were in violation of the law and should be rejected.

Now, then, the American eagle was considered in the Pennsylvania case in reference to whether it constitutes an embellishment or not. We might draw a fine distinction even about this. We find this cited as authority here, and as conclusive in principle against the voice of the majority as cited in their report.

Then we are also referred to section 403 of McCrary, (and I believe it is the last,) which refers to the California cases. This section is as follows:

The supreme court of California has very recently had occasion to consider the force and effect of a statute regulating the size and form of ballots, the kind of paper to be used, the kind of type to be used in printing them, &c. The court held, and we think upon the soundest reason, that as to those things over which the voter has control the law is mandatory, and that as to such things as are not under his control it should be held to be directory only. * * * The conclusion of the court was that the purpose and object of the statute was to secure the freedom and purity of elections and to place the elector above and beyond the reach of improper influences or restraint in casting his ballot, and that it should have such reasonable construction as would tend to secure these important results. And so construing the statute, the court conclude that a ballot cast by an elector in good faith should not be rejected for failure to comply with the law in matters over which the elector has no control, such as the exact size of the ticket, the precise kind of paper, or the particular character of type or heading used, &c.

These references are put into the report, and they might mislead; not purposely, but unintentionally put in to make gentlemen believe that there was some authority somewhere that would hold that such a ticket as was rejected in this Merry Hill precinct in Bertie County, North Carolina, was a "device," and that such ticket was cast in violation of the law; whereas every authority upon the subject, including especially those cited by the majority of the committee in their report, supports the contrary doctrine.

I will not pursue this subject further. There is but one other precinct that I need refer to. The contestee claims that there were 139 voters who would have voted for him in Goose Nest precinct of Hamilton County, North Carolina, if they had been permitted to do so in a just and fair election. I believe that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FIELD] who has given the most attention to the testimony in this case, and given the contestant the advantage of any doubt, cuts this number down to 120. These 120 persons were refused their ballots in this precinct because they were not registered there. Now, if they were not registered there, there was no person registered there, unless perhaps there may have been a few, three or four or as high as a dozen; but there was no registration of 132 democrats that voted in that precinct although the majority of the committee do not find any difficulty in counting them, while the votes of these 120 or 139, as the case may be, who were not registered were not received. The statutes of North Carolina, as has been fully and elaborately explained by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. FIELD,] that is the statute on the subject of registration of voters in cases where they have removed from the places where they have been properly registered, is clear and plain in the light of that explanation.

But not one of these voters did remove; not a single one of the 120 removed from the place where they had been living and were at the time of the election, and where they lived when they voted or tried to vote. Hamilton precinct was divided and Goose Nest precinct was cut off from it, and these names were transferred to the new precinct rolls. There was no case of removal; they were transferred on the books simply. The judges of election, however, refused to allow the republicans to vote. A democrat went the night before the election, and in violation of the law, as admitted I believe by everybody who has examined it, succeeded in getting certificates of transfer for the democrats from the democratic registrar of Hamilton precinct, on which judges of election in Goose Nest precinct permitted democrats to vote. But the next day it was "unlawful" for the republicans to attempt to vote, and certificates were refused to them by the very same persons who gave the certificates to the democrats. They could not find any authority for giving them to the republicans.

I put this case on the ground that no action was required on the part of any of these voters; it was not a case of removal; they were simply voting where they were by law placed—in a new precinct—and if we turn to the statute on the subject that will be made quite plain. Section 7 of the law relating to registrars of North Carolina says:

No elector shall be entitled to register or vote in any other precinct or township than the one in which he is an actual and bona fide resident on the day of election, and no certificate of registration shall be given.

Now, section 12 of the same act contains the words which I will ask the Clerk to read, down to where provision is made for the form of the oath.

The Clerk read as follows:

And if an elector has previously been admitted to registration in any ward, township, or precinct in the county in which he resides, he shall not be allowed to register again in another ward, precinct, or township in the same county, until he produces a certificate of the registrar of the former township, ward, or precinct that said elector has removed from said township, ward, or precinct, and that his name has been erased from the registration books of the ward, township, or precinct from which he has removed; and the identity of any person claiming the right to be registered in any precinct of the same county, by virtue of such certificate, with the person named therein, shall be proved by the oath of the claimant, and when required by the registrar, by the oath of at least one other elector.

Mr. KEIFER. That is as far as the Clerk needs to read. The balance of the section gives the form of the oath.

Now, it will be noted that that section refers to cases of removal. Only when a man removes from one voting precinct to another is it necessary for him to apply in person and have his name erased from the books of the place where he had been registered, and then get a certificate so that he may register in another place. But these voters that tendered their votes in this Goose Nest precinct did not remove. The precinct was established around them.

I come now to the further point that I suggested: the one hundred and thirty-two democrats who voted in this precinct on certificates that were issued on the application of one person voted illegally if it was necessary for this twelfth section of the statutes relating to registers in that State to be complied with. Why? Because each one of them would have had personally to apply and take an oath himself as to his removing, and if required by the registrar, furnish other evidence of the fact of his removal. So that all the certificates that were used—and this is a fact not disputed in the case—all the certificates that were used by democrats were certificates that were illegally issued. And although the judges of election were notified of that fact, they received the democratic votes here and refused the republican voters who offered their votes. And the Hamilton precinct registrar refused to give certificates on the day of the election to these republicans when they applied for them.

In conclusion, I may add that this House is asked and expected to affirm and confirm all these outrages upon the sitting member and vote in the contestant. We are asked now to put our confirmation and our sign of approval upon all these outrages on the people of the first district of North Carolina, on the sitting member, and on the country.

We are asked by our vote here, to-day or to-morrow, whenever we reach it, to say it is all right for contrivances, schemes, acts of omission or acts of commission to be worked out to consummation by officers of election to defeat the voice of the people in that district. We are asked to approve of the premeditated act and conduct of a man who unblushingly appears as an attorney in this case, and comes here swearing that he himself set up a scheme, or device, or plan by which he robbed one hundred and eight men in his own precinct of their elective franchise. And we in the House of Representatives in the Congress of the United States are, by our votes, asked to say that this J. B. Martin did a nice, decent thing, because it only operates to exclude a republican from his seat. We are asked then to say as to these illegal acts on the part of the judges of election in this precinct in Hamilton and the Goose Nest precinct, in their refusal to allow these men to vote, they did right in allowing democrats to vote who were exactly in the same position so far as the law was concerned.

I may have been earnest, and if the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MANNING] proposes to say that I have been passionate I offer this single excuse, that I have been asked as a part of my duty, not alone as a member of a committee but as a member of this House, by my act and vote to approve of this sort of thing. My voice and vote shall be against such action. I warn gentlemen that whether the day is come now, or whether it is only near at hand, or whether it is still in the remote future—I warn gentlemen that the sooner they put the seal of infamy upon all such proceedings as this and upon all men who countenance them, who aid them, who are auxiliaries to these grave crimes against the elective franchise the better—I warn them that the day is coming when all such persons will be swept from the Halls of Congress, and forever. The American people South as well as North—I am happy to say I believe that the Southern people are equally ready to do so—will stamp down in a political point of view all those persons who are willing to approve of such conduct as we will here approve if we adopt the report of the majority.

My conclusion is that Mr. Martin is entitled to hold his seat, and I find his true majority to be 375.

Mr. RUSSELL, of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, the questions involved in this case, in their details, are somewhat difficult——

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask if the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FIELD] has expired? I mean the two hours.

Mr. RUSSELL, of North Carolina. Was there any understanding of that sort?

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. STEVENSON.) The two hours have expired.

Mr. RUSSELL, of North Carolina. I do not understand we are proceeding on this side of the House under any arrangement.

Mr. SPRINGER. I did not say any arrangement had been made. I wish to know how much time the gentleman desires.

Mr. RUSSELL, of North Carolina. I have the floor and will proceed without any understanding from the other side. I believe we have failed to arrive at any understanding in this matter; and, having the floor, I will proceed to say what I have to say on this case, which will not occupy any long time.

Mr. SPRINGER rose.

Mr. RUSSELL, of North Carolina. I decline to yield.

Mr. SPRINGER. I did not ask the gentleman to yield the floor. I simply give notice that at the close of his remarks I will move the previous question.

Mr. RUSSELL, of North Carolina. Then I will keep the floor. Now, sir, no graver question can be presented to this House than one like that which this House is called upon to determine in this case. It goes to the very foundation of government in America. Cases like this are to determine whether in the not remote future free government shall exist in America or not.

We have a crop of from twenty to forty or fifty contested-election cases for the next House of Representatives. Every man knows that for the last ten or fifteen years, and happily for those who have gone before us it cannot be said of the time prior to that—for the last ten or fifteen years it is well known and understood of all men that election cases before this House have been decided by both political parties in a manner which was wrong and which was an infamy that unfortunately nothing can blot from the history of this country. It is known and believed generally by the American people that controversies of this character are decided and settled not by the rules of law, not by equity and justice and honesty, but according to the political necessities and the partisan exigencies of the occasion.

Therefore I have said that in the next Congress there will be from twenty to fifty contested seats. I shall undertake to show that if the principles contended for by the majority of the Committee on Elections are to be adopted as a law by this House, somewhere from twenty to fifty gentlemen from the Southern States certified to the next House of Representatives will walk out some morning and give place to men who will be counted in whether elected or not. I say that if you adopt the reasoning of this Committee of Elections, it will count out your members from the cotton States in the next Congress.

Mr. MCMAHON. We will see.

Mr. RUSSELL, of North Carolina. It is not necessary to say now whether the elections in 1880 in many of those districts were fair or unfair; it is not necessary for me to say now whether the members certified from those districts should be counted out on other reasons or not; but I say that if they are counted out on the ground that not more than one-half of the party vote as compared with preceding elections was polled, which is coolly insisted on in this case, it will be a tolerably bad joke for some of the cotton States in the next Congress.

What is this case? Without going into details, it is briefly this: the sitting member was elected by about 400 majority, fairly, honestly, equitably elected by about 400 majority. The returning boards of his district, finding that he had been elected, proceeded to the discharge of their high and important functions and undertook to count him out, and, as they supposed, they did count him out. [Laughter.]

Now, owing to the fact that this district is not well gridironed with telegraphs and railroads, but consists largely of sounds and inland seas, not having an opportunity to telegraph and communicate among themselves quickly and rapidly, they did not count out enough. They made a mistake in their figures, and instead of counting out 400, as they should have done, they counted out only about 320 or 330 votes for the sitting member.

Now, any returning board that cannot put up a better job than that ought to be abolished, [laughter;] and I understand there is a serious talk down there in our country to abolish them.

There are seven precincts in the controversy in this case. That is to say, there are seven precincts that are called in question by the pleadings in this case. As to one of those precincts, it must be admitted by every candid man that the contestant is in the right. That is the precinct of Providence, in the county of Pasquotank, where the returning board threw out a precinct that gave 39 majority for the contestant. They actually flung out a democratic precinct. [Laughter.] But at the same time it happened, accidentally, of course, that they flung out a republican precinct that gave 135 majority for the contestee. They threw out those two precincts by the same order; they rejected them at the same instant. The record of the board shows that they rejected them for the same reason. Yet we are asked to decide here that they rejected the democratic precinct wrongfully, but they rejected the republican precinct rightfully.

I say again, and it cannot be successfully denied, I think, that so far as the returning board below is concerned—and gentlemen in their report undertake to make a point on that—they undertake to say that we are not now called upon to reject this vote of Salem precinct because it has already been rejected. Now, did anybody ever hear before that this House was concluded by the finding of the returning board below? Are we not sitting here as the ultimate board to decide the whole question, to go behind the returns and count the vote and settle the whole controversy? That is the purpose for which this House, under the Constitution, sits in determining the election, returns, and qualifications of its own members.

Therefore, we are asked to reject the 135 votes of Salem township. It is not the county board that rejects them, but we will be rejecting them if we refuse to count them in this case. There you have it. The two precincts were rejected by the board at the same time and for the same reason.

What was the reason? It was not a reason at all, it was a pretense—that the registrar, who was one of the election board that held the election and took the votes and made the returns,—brought them to the canvassing returning board of the county, as a member of that board, having been appointed by the election board of that precinct.

The North Carolina statute says that the election judges shall appoint one of their number, who shall constitute a member of the returning board of the county, called technically by the statute the canvassing board.

The statute in its phraseology seems to make a distinction between a registrar and an election judge; but any man who will read the statute broadly must admit that there is no distinction so far as the functions of the registrar and the election judges are concerned in the conduct of the election. Every North Carolina member on this floor knows that the registrar in our State is regarded as a member of the election board, just as much as the judge of elections, the poll-holder, the inspector, as the statute indiscriminately calls him. The registrar votes upon the question of the admissibility of a vote. He sits there with the inspectors, taking part in their proceedings; he receives or rejects votes with them, and is to all intents and purposes a member of that election board. The reason why the statute uses the two designations—registrar and election judge—is simply this: that the registrar has additional duties to perform—duties independent of and additional to the duties performed by the election judges. But so far as the conduct of the election itself is concerned you have a board of five members, one registrar and four inspectors. And when the statute in reference to matters of this sort speaks of election judges it means the election board, including the registrar. For example, you find in the statute a clause which says that the election judges shall, after the election is concluded, deposit the registration books with the registrar of deeds for the county. This plainly means that the registrar, as well as the election judges, shall do this, for the registrar is the man who has these books. The election judges, if you are going to take a distinction between them and the registrar, cannot do this, because they have not the books. Hence, when the law says that the election judges shall deposit these registration books, it means the election board. If the intention was to constitute two separate bodies, consisting of the registrar upon the one side and the four inspectors on the other, then the statute ought to have required that the registrar should do this duty, because he is the only man that can do it.

But, sir, is there any lawyer who will seriously contend that even if this construction of the statute is proper it would make any sort of difference? Who cares how the returns may have reached the canvassing board? They were there; they were honest returns; nobody questioned them. Why should they not be counted? This registrar was appointed one of the canvassing board of the county. Was he not a good de facto officer? Will anybody pretend that when an election is honestly held by de facto officers when a returning board counts the vote as de facto officers, in the absence of complicity or conspiracy or fraud, will anybody pretend for a moment that the action of such officers is not valid? It does seem to be somewhat seriously contended, to be sure, by the committee with reference to this Salem precinct, that reasons of this sort are sufficient to invalidate returns and disfranchise freemen. They say:

> The committee are not asked to reject this vote. It is already rejected by the proper authorities of the county, and this record furnishes a conclusion only. Aside from the fact that this board, in the absence of proof to the contrary, is entitled to the legal presumption that they have done their duty, the evidence discloses that there were other and vital informalities in the conduct of the election at that precinct. * * * The evidence of the contestee discloses that the polls were not opened until twelveo'clock, when the law is mandatory that they should be opened at seven; that before they were opened a large number of the voters of the precinct had left; that not more than half of the vote of the precinct was polled; that there was no registrar appointed, and that officers who held the election were not sworn.

Now, it seems to me that it would be difficult to compress more of error into the same space than is found in the extract I have read. The committee seem to proceed upon the idea of the judge who was deciding a demurrer that gave twenty-three grounds or causes of demurrer to a declaration, each being a separate and independent ground. After argument, the judge said he was satisfied that no one of the grounds of demurrer was of any account whatever, but considering them altogether, and inasmuch as there were twenty-three of them, he would sustain the demurrer; and he did. So the committee seemed to think that inasmuch as there was no good and sufficient reason for disfranchising two or three hundred men in this precinct, they would give a large number of very bad and insufficient reasons, and thereby strengthen the case. First, they say that this returning board is entitled to a presumption in its favor; that the board having counted out the vote in that precinct, it lies upon the contestee to show that the board was wrong; that every presumption is in favor of the rightfulness of the action of these officers upon the general principle omnia præsumuntur rite esse acta. I contend that precisely the contrary is the law. When those officers counted out that vote they exceeded their jurisdiction; they exercised a judicial function which, according to the settled election laws of North Carolina and of almost every other State, no returning board has the power to do. If anything is established in the law of this country it is that these election boards are invested with ministerial powers and functions only; that they have nothing in the world to do but to receive the returns, add them up, make the computation, and declare the result. The courts of North Carolina have so held repeatedly; so that no lawyer of that State would for a moment think of making any such point as this in any court for which he had any respect whatever. The canvassing board is not entitled to the benefit of the presumption that their action was correct; but, on the contrary, the presumption is directly against them; nay, it is not a presumption but an absolute conclusion that they violated their duties, because, whether there was cause to reject that return or not, they had no right to decide the question. They should have received that return and counted it. Every one of them is liable to a criminal prosecution in the courts of North Carolina for usurpation of authority and malfeasance in office.

Further, the committee say the evidence discloses "that the polls were not opened until twelve o'clock when the law is mandatory that they should be opened at seven." Now, did anybody ever hear before that it vitiated an election and disfranchised men because that sort of a directory provision in a statute was not strictly complied with? Does not everybody know that you would disfranchise the whole country, you would break up elections all over this land, if you required every minute direction of your election laws to be strictly complied with? I undertake to say there is not one election in a thousand throughout this country where every detail of the statute is strictly complied with. I would confidently rely upon the recollection and judgment of gentlemen on this floor of all parties to sustain me in that assertion. Then they say that before the polls were opened a large number of the voters of the precinct had left. Now, sir, if there is anything clear at all it certainly is that no man should leave the polls because the polls do not happen to be opened at the very moment required by the law and without stopping to inquire whether there is any probability they will be opened during the day. If he leaves in the absence of any reason to believe that no election will be held there during the day, then it is his fault and he has no right to complain, much less to demand because his vote was not received, therefore the whole poll shall be thrown out. There can be no sort of merit in the kind of plea which is sought to be set up here by the contestant.

But at the same time it may be just as well to say here, and it will dispose not only of this but the same complaint in regard to several other of these election precincts, that if you allow the contestant every vote which he claims, every vote which he says he lost on that account, it will only amount to some twenty or thirty, or at the farthest forty. If you gave him every one of them even in reference to which he suggests only a prejudice, it could not possibly change the result but would allow the sitting member to retain his seat. So much, then, for all this talk about the polls being opened one at nine, another at eleven, and another perhaps at twelve o'clock.

Why, Mr. Speaker, the evidence shows the fact is that at these precincts, where all this talk is made about the polls having been opened too late, every single voter on the registration books might have been voted in two hours. The testimony is that the polls, all of them, were open for five hours and most of them for six, seven, and eight hours. The vote itself was about one-half of the registration. There were no candidates voted for save for member of Congress. There was only one ballot and one box, and there might have been voted in those seven or eight hours at every precinct 1,500 or 2,000 men. I say, indeed, that if every man on the registration books, including even the dead men and the men who had removed out of the precincts—because many of them remain on the registration books in spite of all attention—if every living man residing in the township noted on the registration books had been there and offered to vote, you might voted every one of them in two hours at least. But the polls were open more than double that time, indeed more than treble that time, and yet, notwithstanding that fact, it is actually proposed here by this committee to reject the whole poll and disfranchise every man who did vote because the poll was not opened at seven o'clock in the morning.

I undertake to say that no case can be found where an entire poll has been vitiated upon the mere ground that the direction of the statute in regard to the time was not exactly complied with. Cases may be found where polls have been vitiated because the election was stopped, or because the poll was closed before the time fixed by law, and where it appeared affirmatively that such action resulted in great mischief by preventing voters casting their votes. I say no case can be found—and I do not think gentlemen on the other side have found or can find any such case—where the courts have held, merely because the poll was opened too late or too early, the entire precinct should be disfranchised.

Now, sir, there is another precinct in which it is gravely proposed to cast reflection upon the sitting member and to deprive him of some 64 votes of his majority upon the ground that he happened to take up a book, at the request of a political opponent who was the registrar at that precinct, and check off a few names as they came up and voted. The election law of that State prohibits any candidate for election from acting as registrar of election. Some gentleman on the other side, I believe it was the gentleman from Ohio, inquired what Mr. Martin was doing on that day, and how he explained his usurping the functions of an election officer? I suppose the answer to the first question would be that he was there on that day, presuming, as a free American citizen, he had a right to be there; and, in the second place, being afflicted with the ordinary folly of the American citizen, he was a candidate for Congress, and was there looking after his own interest. [Laughter.] I suppose that would account for the first crime he committed.

Now, as to why he did the other thing, and that is, complied with the request of his political opponent. I suppose he did just as any man under the same circumstances would have done. Being requested by the registrar of election to assist him for a moment, and not supposing anybody in the world would take advantage of it, he complied with that request. He sat there for a few minutes and checked off some names, acting as agent of this officer of election. Why, I suppose if he had given these election judges a drink of water, that, too, would have been complained of. They might as well charge him with giving Overton the liquor with which they allege he got drunk on that occasion. I do not know that any one of these things would have vitiated the election. There is no evidence he acted in a judicial capacity in passing upon the question whether a man should be rejected or not. There is positive evidence that he merely acted in a purely ministerial way. There is evidence that men voted there while he was acting as registrar. There is not a line of testimony to show anybody was prejudiced by his action. The most you could do would be to reject the votes, if any, received at the time while he was thus acting, and that only when there has been positive evidence of wrong-doing on his part.

Here he was one of a board of five. Suppose this registrar of election had gone off and no one had taken his place, would it be pretended that this vacated the poll? Can it be claimed the case would be any stronger or that it would be any worse if there had been a vacancy in the office of registrar, leaving four, which certainly is a quorum of five, to act and carry on the election? It does not appear that his voice or vote influenced in any way the result of the election on the admission or rejection of any vote while he was acting in that capacity.

In Goose Nest precinct they have rejected some one hundred and twenty votes because the registrars failed to give a certificate upon the allegation that it was necessary under the election laws of North Carolina they should obtain a certificate from the registrar, it having been ordered by the county commissioners previously that this precinct of Goose Nest should be established, and all those living at Goose Nest should vote at Goose Nest, and not at Hamilton as they had done before.

Now, sir, a candid examination of the election statutes of North Carolina will convince any man, I think, that in that matter the law is silent. Here is a provision that the commissioners may establish a new poll, that they may select a number of election precincts already existing and declare that parties living within certain boundaries in that election precinct shall vote at the new places. Other duties and powers are prescribed; but in reference to this point to which I am now referring the statute is silent. These commissioners and these registrars of election did precisely what they ought to have done under, not directly under, the law, but in the absence of any provision of the statute thereon. Having the authority under the statute to establish new polling places, that authority gave them the power to do what was necessary to establish these precincts, and to establish them it was necessary to provide for registration, and to provide that the registration should be prior to any election; and they did it. How? By simply directing the registrar of any new precinct to obtain the names of the voters from the old precinct and put them upon the new books, and by doing this it would entitle them to vote. They did it; they complied with this requirement of the law, but these registrars and the election judges met together on the Monday before the election on Tuesday when the law required them to meet on Saturday, and came to the conclusion that inasmuch as they found something or other in the statute that says a man must have a certificate when he moves from one township into another before he can vote, that they would reject every vote presented in that precinct unless it be accompanied by a certificate. The democratic registrar goes to the old precinct and obtains the name of every democrat, and gets a certificate signed for every one of them. On the next day they are voted because they have a certificate. The republican voters go and demand the certificate from the same registrar who had granted it to the democrats who got it before the election, and they are refused. They tender their votes on the day of election and are refused. They are refused because they have no certificate, which they could not obtain from the democratic judges of election and which was not necessary for them to have under the statute. They have complied with the statute in all other respects. They have done everything that was demanded of them or that men can do. They have first applied for the certificate that was not necessary and, being refused, they tendered their votes and the votes were rejected.

Now, what else could they do? Under the election laws of this country, which I have now before me, but which I will not stop to read, governing the election of members of Congress, cases of this sort are provided for. It is universally conceded that wherever an elector tenders his vote or offers to do that by law required to be done, that he shall be held to have complied with the law, and shall be entitled to all the benefits as much as if his vote was received and counted.

Then in the case of Merry Hill precinct, they rejected 108 votes upon the ground that there was a device upon the ticket. I hold in my hand, Mr. Speaker, one of these tickets. There it is. There is a ticket, and such a ticket as I venture to say is voted and used by the people of three-fourths of the States of this Union. And what is the device upon it? It contains the words, "Republican ticket; for Congress, J. J. Martin." Because the words "Republican ticket" are on the top of it and on the inside of it, it is gravely held that this is a "device" under the election laws of North Carolina and that it should not be counted.

The election law of North Carolina in this respect is mandatory, not merely directory. If the law had simply said that no ticket should be used which contained a device upon it, why this question could not arise at all, because of course any court would hold that that was a mere direction of the statute, and even a violation of it would not vitiate the vote. But the statute goes further and declares that in counting the votes the inspector of election shall reject all votes which have a device upon them. That makes the law not merely directory but mandatory; and I admit that if this is a device within the meaning of the statute, then the votes should not be counted. Now, I hold that it is not a device upon any fair construction of the statute. Why, sir, the contemporaneous history of that clause in the election laws of North Carolina is well known and such as any court would take notice of. We have been in the habit, especially we republicans living in the State, of using devices such as pictures upon our republican tickets until in the year 1871 in a contest for a constitutional convention. At that time it was charged by the republicans against the democrats that their purpose was to strike down the homestead guarantee of our constitution. When we came to the election we got up a lot of tickets with a homestead on the back of them, a picture representing a house or something of that kind, and with some expression written under it, "Save the homestead," perhaps, or some such motto. That ticket was used largely throughout the State; in fact it was very generally used throughout the State, and it resulted in a defeat of the democratic party at that election by about ten thousand votes. At the next session of the Legislature they stuck a clause in the election laws declaring that no ticket thereafter should have any device upon it.

Now, sir, the principle of construction in this case is plain. A law that is penal in its character, or a law that is in derogation of common right—especially a law that is in derogation of popular right—must be construed strictly. If the Legislature intended any more than they said, why did not they say so? If they intended that words and expressions, a sentence, should be a device, why did they not say so? A statute of this sort must be construed precisely as you would a statute that imposed a penalty or enacted a crime. Suppose a man should be indicted in the courts of that State, for example, for using a ticket with a device on it, and the construction of the statute was invoked, would any court say that in the absence of plain language showing the intention of the Legislature they can hold that man to criminal pains and penalties? Would they not say this is a criminal statute: we must construe it strictly: we do not find any words there that embrace this case; we must construe it in favor of the citizen and against the State? That is the rule of judicial construction everywhere. And so here; it is in derogation of popular right and it must be construed strictly; that is, no further than the words necessarily import. Every doubt must be given to the citizen. So that, Mr. Speaker, upon this general and established principle of statutory construction it would be, it seems to me, determined without argument by any court in this land that this was not a device.

But, sir, it is not a device on any principle of construction. You may construe it broadly, liberally, or strictly as you choose, and you cannot get out of the word "device" a meaning which will include an ordinary English expression. Device means an emblem in that connection; a picture. It does not mean a statement in words. And, sir, let it be remembered that the contestant in this case, who seeks to avoid these tickets, is taking advantage of the act, perpetrated, if not by himself, by one of his supporters and principal friends. Let it be remembered that it is a trick disreputable in itself and indefensible on any ground whereby it was intended to disfranchise all the men at that precinct in the interest of this contestant. I ask the Clerk to read the testimony of J. B. Martin on that point.

The Clerk read as follows:

J. B. Martin, a witness on part of the contestee, Joseph J. Martin, being duly sworn, deposes and says:

Q. What is your name, age, and occupation?

A. James B. Martin; age, thirty-five; occupation, attorney-at-law; resident of Bertie County.

Q. Just previous to the congressional election in 1878 did you have printed some tickets, as follows: "Republican ticket. For Congress, J. J. Martin;" if so, who printed them, and how many were received by you?

A. I did. I did not receive to exceed one hundred and fifty. William M. Bond, of Edenton, printed them.

Q. Were those received by you prior to the election?

A. I received them night before election.

Q. What did you do with them?

A. A part of them were put in an envelope and directed to Daniel Cooper, and deposited in Nicholl's store, at Merry Hill precinct, in a box, where the public got their mail. I think some of them were placed near the voting place, in a box near the polls.

Q. Who directed the envelope?

A. I did.

Q. Who is Daniel Cooper?

A. A negro politician of the republican party.

Q. Was he an active supporter of Mr. J. J. Martin at said election?

A. I presume so, from the fact that he distributed those tickets very rapidly.

Q. Who did you support?

A. Jesse J. Yeates.

Q. Did you and James B. Nicholls put up those tickets in packages, at the time and place mentioned?

A. We put them up in one package and directed them to Daniel Cooper.

Q. Who requested you to have those tickets printed?

A. No one.

Q. Is Cooper an ignorant man?

A. I judge he could read, from the fact that he examined those tickets and compared them with others.

Q. Was any representation made to Cooper that those tickets were sent by J. J. Martin?

A. No such representation made to him by myself, nor any other person to my knowledge.

Q. Was the envelope containing the tickets stamped with a United States postage stamp?

A. It was not, to the best of my knowledge and belief.

Q. Were any of these tickets voted at Merry Hill precinct at said election?

A. Tickets similar in appearance were voted at said election—about 109, as I am informed. I am not positive as to the number.

Q. Were the said tickets so voted refused to be counted for J. J. Martin, candidate for Congress, at said November election held at Merry Hill precinct, Bertie County, in said congressional election and State?

A. I do not know of my own knowledge.

Q. What is your best information and belief as to that?

A. Basing my answer on hearsay evidence they were not counted.

Q. By whom were the said tickets thrown out and refused to be counted?

A. I do not know of my own knowledge.

Q. What is your best information and belief on that point?

A. From hearsay testimony, by the judges of election at said precinct, on the ground of device and voting more than one ticket. The device consisting in the words "republican ticket" printed on the said ballot.

(Answer to the two preceding questions objected to on the ground of hearsay.)

Q. What was the political complexion of the board of judges of election?

A. My impression is that J. E. Nicholls, J. H. Brown, T. J. Webb, and James W. Smith were the judges of election, all of whom were democrats, and supported J. J. Yeates for Congress.

Mr. RUSSELL, of North Carolina. That is sufficient. Now, there it appears that there was a fraud deliberately planned—not by the contestant himself, there is no evidence of that, but by his friends, in furtherance of his election; that this man was his counsel in this very case, if not his counsel at that time, and I do not know he needed a counsel then, but that the contestant has since recognized this man and used him to assist him in obtaining a seat upon this floor.

This man, a prominent politician of his political party in that county, the presiding magistrate of the inferior court of that county, as appears by the evidence—this man who, according to the evidence, had charge of the interests of the contestant in that county, deliberately plans and perpetrates a fraud by which he gets 108 votes, imposing them upon the ignorance, as he thought, of these voters, into the box, and then stands up and says, "I object to their being counted." And they count them out at his demand. And this House is asked to sustain conduct of that character.

This man J. B. Martin did not know and he did not care whether those words "republican ticket" were a device under the laws of North Carolina or not. All he wanted was an excuse to urge whereby he could get up some pretext or other for rejecting one hundred and odd votes. So he goes to printing tickets and has printed a lot of tickets with those words, "republican ticket," printed on them. And then he goes and puts these into a post-office directed to a leading politician of that precinct, and directed in such a way as to produce on that man's mind the impression they had come from the republican candidate for Congress; and that republican politician, not seeing there was anything wrong about them—and we say here there was nothing wrong about them, we say if that republican politician had been the Chief-Justice of the United States he might have put that construction upon the law—takes those tickets and uses them, he gives them to the republican voters at the precinct, they are put into the box; and thereupon this J. B. Martin jumps up and objects to their being counted.

Sir, even if on a technical construction of this statute these votes were not lawful, where is the man who would honestly and conscientiously accept office on such terms?

Without discussing the details of this case further, I remark, in the same spirit in which I began this discussion, that if a precedent is wanted for the reversal of popular verdicts for the Congresses that shall come after us, if a precedent is wanted whereby the reversal of popular verdicts may be justified, if a precedent is wanted whereby a flagrant and atrocious wrong may be pleaded in defense of another wrong, no better opportunity can be found than is presented by this case. In a few weeks, as we all know, power in this House swings to the other side of this Chamber, and then you of the majority will have no right to complain if they follow in your footsteps and inscribe upon their banners the indefensible sentiment: "The villainy you teach me I will execute."

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, announced the passage of the following bill and joint and concurrent resolutions without amendment:

A bill (H. R. No. 2180) granting an increase of pension to James A. Reeve; Joint resolution (H. R. No. 266) ratifying the settlement of taxes made by the District commissioners with the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 224) to print 6,000 copies of the report of the National Board of Health; and Concurrent resolution to print 30,000 extra copies of the second revised edition of the report of the United States Entomological Commission on cotton and boll worms.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—YEATES VS. MARTIN.

Mr. JONES rose.

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to move the previous question. Whatever discussion takes place on this case let it be after the previous question is ordered.

Mr. KEIFER. I did not fully understand the gentleman's statement.

Mr. SPRINGER. I stated I rose to move the previous question.

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] desires to speak, and is ready to speak now.

Mr. SPRINGER. After the previous question is seconded there will be another hour for debate.

Mr. KEIFER. There are two or three other gentlemen who desire to speak.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I call for the regular order.

Mr. SPRINGER. Three hours have been given to gentlemen on that side, which I think is sufficient for the discussion of the case at this stage of the session.

Mr. KEIFER. I warn the gentleman that he will not, perhaps, make progress by pressing his motion. I think he will find he has made a mistake if he undertakes to cut off debate.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to give a fair and full opportunity to discuss this case, and I think the gentleman from Ohio will not say we have not given that opportunity.

Mr. KEIFER. So far as I am personally concerned, I have had my hour; but gentlemen ought not to endeavor to cut off debate on so important a question as this.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. STEVENSON.) The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] moves the previous question on the pending resolutions.

The question was taken upon seconding the previous question; and upon a division there were—ayes 109, noes 1.

Mr. KEIFER. No quorum has voted.

Mr. BOUCK. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. HUNTON. I hope the House will not adjourn; a session has been ordered for this evening.

Many MEMBERS. Regular order!

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will call the attention of the House to a previous order in respect to a session this evening.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] said the other day that there would be no factious opposition to this case.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House this evening is set apart for the consideration of business from the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HAYES. We do not want any more night sessions.

Mr. BURROWS. A motion to adjourn is in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands that.

Mr. BURROWS. Then I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair made the statement he did for the information of the House.

The question was taken upon the motion to adjourn, and upon a division there were ayes 106, noes 111.

Before the result of this vote was announced,

Mr. KEIFER called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. KEIFER and Mr. SPRINGER were appointed.

Before the tellers took their places,

Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania, and Mr. BLAND called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 118, nays 115, not voting 59; as follows:

Mr. HUTCHINS with Mr. WALTER A. WOOD.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee, with Mr. HOUK.

Mr. JAMES with Mr. O'BRIEN.

Mr. FISHER with Mr. BRIGHT.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1470) granting a pension to Francis H. Bird, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. JONAS, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1220) for the relief of Henry M. Rector and John H. Russell, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I am also directed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1579) granting a pension to Mrs. Sallie T. Ward, to report it adversely. Mr. EDMUNDS. I am directed by the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. No. 1439) to confirm the Stratton survey of the pueblo of San Francisco, to report that we have examined the same and that we find it is an ordinary case of a confirmation by the judicial courts under the California land commission act of 1851 of the pueblo of San Francisco, and that the only real question is the execution of the decree and applying it to the land. The statutes require the location of the decree to be done by the executive officers of the United States; and the committee as at present advised see no reason for the interference of Congress, but think that the matter, so far as we now understand it, ought to be left to the authorities where the law has left it in such cases. We therefore recommend that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The bill was postponed indefinitely.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WHYTE asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2112) authorizing the inspection and issue of an American register to the British steamship Gulnare; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. DAWES asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2113) to establish the rights of the Ponca tribe of Indians, and to settle their affairs; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee to examine into the circumstances connected with the removal of the Northern Cheyennes from the Sioux reservation to the Indian Territory.

Mr. SAUNDERS asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2114) for the relief of Captain W. W. Ivory; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I have been requested by a citizen of Iowa to present for reference a bill, which I send to the table, and with it the articles of incorporation of the company named in the bill. I have not had time to read either the bill or the articles of incorporation, but I desire that the bill, with the accompanying papers, be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. WALLACE asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2118) granting a pension to Emma A. Ramsey; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. COCKRELL asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2119) to authorize the publication of a descriptive catalogue of all Government publications from July 4, 1776, to date; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. BLAINE asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2120) for the establishment of United States ocean mail service and the revival of foreign commerce in American steamships; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. BLAINE. I want the bill referred to whatever committee has under consideration the bill which was discussed by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] yesterday, which, I believe, is the Committee on Finance. As the bill only contains two sections, if the Senate will give me permission, I should like to have it read. It is offered as a substitute for the bill of the Senator from Kentucky.

The bill was read at length, and referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the owners of American steamships of 3,000 tons register or upward, constructed after approved models and equal in accommodations, safety, and speed to the mail-carrying vessels of any nation, shall be entitled to receive for carrying the United States mails on regular lines of such steamships from any port or ports in the United States to any foreign port or ports, mail compensation not exceeding $30 per nautical mile per annum for the distance one way for twelve round trips per annum; $45 per mile for twenty-four trips, and $60 per mile for forty-eight trips per annum; in accordance with contracts to be made for such mail transportation by the Postmaster-General after public advertisement for proposals with the lowest bidders on each line, for terms not exceeding fifteen years, and upon all the conditions for securing rapid and efficient transportation which are usual or established by law in similar cases.

SEC. 2. Only those steamships shall be accepted for such service which have been built in American ship-yards, of American materials, and by American mechanics; and they shall be commanded by citizens of the United States, and manned by crews of whom at least three-fourths are American citizens; and before being accepted they shall be duly inspected under the direction of the Postmaster-General and the Secretary of the Navy; and such Secretary may also allow any officer of the Navy leave of absence for not exceeding five years for the purpose of serving on such ships, which absence shall be without pay, but without prejudice to rank or promotion.

Mr. WALLACE. I ask leave to introduce a joint resolution, and I desire that it lie on the table so that I may call it up at some future time, in order to submit some remarks upon it when the Senate shall do me the pleasure to hear me.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 148) proposing an amendment to the Constitution, changing the mode of electing President and Vice-President of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table.

HARBOR OF REFUGE ON PACIFIC COAST.

Mr. FARLEY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to furnish the Senate with a copy of the report of A. F. Rogers, of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, on the proposed harbor of refuge for the Pacific coast.

JAMES H. REEVE.

Mr. VOORHEES. Yesterday the Senate considered and passed the bill (H. R. No. 2180) granting an increase of pension to James H.

Reeve. The Senator from Virginia, [Mr. WITHERS,] the chairman of the Committee on Pensions, was then present and confirmed the statement that I made on which the Senate passed the bill. I learn from the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] that the Senator from Virginia, who is absent to-day at home, has addressed him a note on the subject. I ask that the bill be withheld from the President until Monday, when the Senator returns, so that he may take any action he desires.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator had better enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. VOORHEES. I will say to the Senator from Kansas that if the Senator from Virginia, when he returns on Monday wants to enter a motion for reconsideration, he can do so.

Mr. INGALLS. But in the absence of a motion to reconsider, have the officers of the Senate any right to withhold the bill, it having passed? I should say not.

Mr. JOHNSTON. As the absence of my colleague has been referred to, I desire to state that he was called home by a telegram announcing the death of his sister, and that he will be here on Monday.

Mr. HARRIS. I will enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, so that it may be reserved.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion to reconsider will be entered. That will stay it.

Mr. HARRIS subsequently said: I entered a motion this morning to reconsider the vote by which the Senate passed the bill (H. R. No. 2180) granting an increase of pension to James H. Reeve. I am informed by the Secretary that the bill has been returned to the House of Representatives. I now move that the Secretary be instructed to ask its return.

The motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC GROUNDS IN CHICAGO.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The business of the morning hour is concluded.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I gave notice on Tuesday last that I would ask the indulgence of the Senate to take up this morning the bill (S. No. 1935) to confirm to the city of Chicago the title to certain public grounds.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Senator from Illinois will not try to take up that bill this morning. I hope we shall go on with the order of the Calendar under the Anthony rule, if there is nothing else to be done. The report was only made two or three days ago, and the views which I had the honor to submit are only just this morning printed and laid on the table. In addition to that, since the minority report which I submitted has been made, I have received information from respectable sources in Chicago that the tax-paying portion of that city are strongly opposed to this measure, that they regard it as one that is to result in a great injury to the tax-payers of that city for reasons which they state and which I cannot debate on the mere taking up of the bill; and from other parties I have just received at my desk protests in respect of certain private rights that are going to be affected, as they say, by the passage of this bill, which I have not had time to examine, and I do not know what they are.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I can satisfy the Senator on that point.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That may be; but I think it would be more satisfactory in respect to a bill of this great importance that there should be a little time to allow the tax-paying people who are interested to be still further heard from, and to allow the persons who claim that their private rights are to be injured to have time enough to enable Senators to understand what their pretensions are. I hope, therefore, that the Senate will go on with the pension cases or something, and not take up this bill this morning.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Mr. President, it is of the highest importance that if this bill is acted upon by this Congress it should be acted upon in this body very soon. It is of no use to keep it here for two or three weeks and go on with the Calendar. I presented the report of the Judiciary Committee on Tuesday last, and then gave notice that I would ask to take this bill up to-day. I certainly have not asked the indulgence of the Senate very much this winter, and I do not see why we cannot as well consider the bill now as in the future. If any particular day within two or three days could be set for its consideration, I should have no objection to that; but everybody knows that every other Senator has got some important bill that he wants acted upon, and inasmuch as I have got the ear of the Senate now, I do not see why the bill should not be taken up and acted on.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. What motion does the Senator submit?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. To set aside the Anthony rule.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois moves to postpone the pending order, which is the consideration of the Calendar under the Anthony rule, for the purpose indicated by him, and the question is, Will the Senate postpone the pending order?

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to say a word in reference to this bill that my colleague wishes to have taken up by the Senate. It is of the utmost importance that this bill should be acted on as soon as possible if it is to be passed this session. It is a bill of very great importance to the people generally and especially to the city of Chicago.

So far as the private rights of individuals mentioned by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] are concerned, I do not think there will be anything found in this bill that will interfere with the private rights of any individual or individuals. It is a bill that is certainly desired by the people there; and although there may be objections to it, in my judgment there can certainly be no valid objection to its passage when it is understood by the Senate.

I hope, therefore, that the motion of my colleague will be agreed to and that the bill may be taken up and have the Senate understand its provisions and see whether there is anything objectionable in it or not. I think they will find that there is not.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, the rule of the Senate forbids me upon this motion to speak to the merits of this bill. For that reason, I shall not do so, but I have another. If upon the bill being considered it turns out that it is wanting in merit, I wish to hold myself entirely free upon being informed of that to oppose the bill and to vote against it. I rise, however, for the purpose of saying that this matter has recently been considered quite fully; I may say, I believe, without impropriety, first by a sub-committee of the Judiciary Committee and afterward by the Judiciary Committee itself at two meetings. A report from that committee is here, a printed report covering some four pages; the matter is fresh in recollection all around; and for myself, I feel that I could act upon it now, at least as far as we may go before we ascertain that there is something which has not been brought to the notice of the committee, better than I could were it to lie over to a future day. It is a fresh transaction now before us; and for one I should be very glad to act upon it. And referring to what has been said by the Senator from Vermont, if after the bill is taken up it turns out that he has information which was not considered by the committee which changes the aspect of the case, the bill can be laid aside or deferred then; but it seems to me that as far as the matter is now understood, it will be convenient and desirable to go on with it.

In addition to that, as the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] has said, if the bill is to be acted upon by both Houses at this session of Congress there is no time to be lost. If it be an unmeritorious bill, this is a very good time to defeat it; if there be merit in it, concerning as it does the convenience of a great many people, this is an opportune moment to consider it. Therefore I shall vote to take up the bill.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Mr. President, evidently the bill now sought to be taken up is likely to provoke discussion and take considerable time. I wish to say that the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. WITHERS,] the chairman of the Committee on Pensions, gave notice yesterday that he intended calling up to-day the unobjected pension cases on the Calendar. As this bill is likely to take a large amount of the time of the Senate, I would suggest that the pension cases be first considered.

Mr. THURMAN. Why does the Senator suppose the bill will take much time?

Mr. MCPHERSON. We have already had sufficient indications of that.

Mr. THURMAN. The whole thing is in a nutshell; the case can be understood in ten minutes by the Senate.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I am willing to consider it for a reasonable time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Illinois to postpone the pending order.

Mr. COKE. I hope that the motion of the Senator from Illinois will not prevail. There is a bill, which is the unfinished business, that I think ought to be acted on. Will this motion affect that?

Mr. CONKLING. This does not interfere with the Senator's unfinished business.

Mr. COKE. Then I shall make no objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Illinois to postpone the Calendar of general orders.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senate now consider the bill named by the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. MCPHERSON. I desire to call up unobjected pension cases on the Calendar reported from the Committee on Pensions.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The pending question now is, Will the Senate consider the bill (S. No. 1935) to confirm to the city of Chicago the title to certain public grounds?

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that all the right and title of the United States to the streets and grounds dedicated to public use in that part of the city of Chicago, in the State of Illinois, known as "Fort Dearborn addition to Chicago," subdivided and platted under the authority of the Secretary of War in 1839, shall be relinquished and granted to that city and its successors, with authority to sell and convey so much thereof as lies south of the south line of Randolph street and between the east line of Michigan avenue, as now laid out and improved, and the roadway of the Illinois Central Railroad Company, for the erection thereon of a railway passenger station-house and other purposes incident thereto.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now let us hear the report, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, on the 25th instant:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1935) entitled "A bill to confirm to the city of Chicago the title to certain public grounds," have had the same under consideration, and have directed me to make the following report:

The public grounds referred to in the bill are situated in that part of the city of Chicago known as "Fort Dearborn addition." It appears that this addition is a subdivision of the fractional southwest quarter of section 10, in township 39 north, of range 14 east of the third principal meridian, containing, according to the official Government survey made in 1821, 57.32 acres. It is bounded on the north by the Chicago River and on the east by Lake Michigan.

For many years, commencing as early as 1804, the tract was occupied by the Government as a military post and Indian agency, and in the year 1824, at the request of the Secretary of War, was formally reserved from sale for military purposes. In the year 1839, Mr. Poinsett, Secretary of War, under the direction of the President, appointed Matthew Birchard, solicitor of the General Land Office, as the agent of the War Department for the purpose of selling such portion of the reservation as was no longer required for military purposes, or for the use of the light-house which had been erected upon the land near the mouth of the river. The agent was directed to subdivide the land into town lots, and to procure and execute the necessary survey and plat thereof. After recording the plat, he was instructed to make an estimate of the value of each lot, availing himself for this purpose of the best information he could obtain at Chicago, and then to advertise the lots for sale to the highest bidders, reserving, however, from sale the light-house and buildings connected with it, and such quantity of land as he should think necessary to retain for the use of the light-house. Should the bids offered for the lots be considered inadequate, he was authorized to decline them.

Acting under this authority, Mr. Birchard proceeded to Chicago, and, after a conference with a committee appointed by the common council of the city, adopted a plan for the proposed subdivision. In conformity to the provisions of the State statute then in force, providing for the making and recording of town plats, he caused the land to be surveyed by the county surveyor, and a map or plat of the survey to be made, on which the entire tract was subdivided into blocks, lots, streets, alleys, and public grounds. The plat, duly certified by the county surveyor and acknowledged by Mr. Birchard, was recorded in the county registry of deeds; and for more than forty years it has been recognized by the Executive Department of the Government as a lawful and duly authorized subdivision of the land thereon described. It has also received the express recognition of Congress in disposing of some of the lots not sold in 1839. (see act for the relief of Jean Baptiste Beaubien, 10 Statutes at Large, page 805.) The plat was styled "Fort Dearborn addition to Chicago." Sales were made by Mr. Birchard of most of the property, and the Government is reported to have received more than two hundred and eighty thousand dollars for the lots sold. The sales were confirmed by the Secretary of War, and no suggestion has ever been made that the property did not bring its full value at the time, or that the plan adopted for selling it was not advantageous to the Government.

The lots having been sold as delineated upon the recorded plat, the purchasers acquired an interest in the streets and public grounds on which their lots abutted; and it is manifest that the Government could not after the sale make any disposition of those streets or public grounds inconsistent with the use to which they had been dedicated. The attempt to do so, if it had the power, without the consent of the lot-owners interested, or making adequate provision for their compensation, would be a flagrant act of bad faith.

The statute of the State, with the provisions of which the agent evidently intended to comply in making and recording the plat, provided that the land intended to be used for streets, commons, or other public uses, and noted as such on the plat, should vest in fee-simple in the town or city where they were situated, to be held in the corporate name thereof for the uses and purposes thus expressed or intended. By virtue of that and subsequent statutes of a similar character, the legal title to the streets and other public grounds in the different towns and cities of Illinois, with rare exceptions, is vested in the local municipality, the simple acknowledgment and recording of the plat on which they are laid down operating as a sufficient conveyance from the donor and as a general warranty against him and his heirs to the donee, for the uses and purposes thus indicated.

It appears, however, from a decision made a few years since by the United States circuit court at Chicago, that the presiding judge was of the opinion that although the streets and public grounds in Fort Dearborn addition to Chicago had been lawfully dedicated with the consent of the Government, through its authorized agent, to public use, yet in consequence of certain technical informalities in making the plat, the dedication operated as a common-law dedication, and not under the statute, and therefore that the legal title to the streets and public grounds was still in the United States, subject to the public use, which had been affixed to them—the United States, however, having no control over them inconsistent with the purpose for which they had been dedicated. The bill proposes that this mere naked legal title shall be relinquished to the city of Chicago; and your committee are of opinion that the General Government has no interest in retaining that title, after having parted with all beneficial interest in the property forty years ago for ample consideration.

The bill further proposes that the consent of Congress shall be granted to the sale and conveyance by the city of Chicago of a portion of the ground dedicated to public use upon the plat of this addition, for the erection thereon of a railway passenger station-house, which, it appears, is intended for the joint use and accommodation of several important railway lines entering the city upon the tracks and right of way of the Illinois Central Railroad Company which lie immediately adjacent.

The facts relating to this feature of the bill appear to be substantially as follows: The eastern boundary of Fort Dearborn addition is Lake Michigan, and the southern boundary is Madison street. Randolph street lies two blocks north of Madison street and runs parallel with it to the lake. Between these two streets, a small piece of ground irregular in shape, lying east of blocks 12 and 15 and between them and the lake, is delineated on the plat, across which were written the words, "Public ground, forever to remain vacant of buildings," and in an explanatory statement written on the margin of the plat and signed by Mr. Birchard, as agent of the Secretary of War, there is this declaration: "The public ground between Randolph and Madison streets, and fronting on Lake Michigan, is not to be occupied with buildings of any description." A street ninety feet wide, called Michigan avenue, was extended many years ago in a direct line through this public ground from Randolph street on the north to Madison street on the south. The ground lying east of this avenue and between Randolph street and Madison street was, at the time of the subdivision in 1839, a narrow strip of land on the margin of the lake, nearly eight hundred feet long, and varying in width from about fifty feet at Randolph street to about one hundred feet at Madison street. In 1852 the width of the strip had been reduced by gradual abrasion, caused by the action of the lake, to twenty-two and a half feet at Randolph street, and at Madison street the entire surface of the strip had worn away and completely disappeared beneath the waters of the lake. This process of erosion had then been going on for many years along the whole city front upon the lake shore.

During that year the Illinois Central Railroad was constructed. By virtue of its charter, and an ordinance of the city passed pursuant to the provisions of the charter, the railroad company was authorized to occupy for its right of way a space three hundred feet wide in front of fractional sections 10 and 15, in the open waters of the lake, upon the condition, which was complied with, that the company should construct a breakwater along the east line of its right of way sufficient to protect the shore from further encroachments by the lake. The inner line of the right of way was established at a distance of four hundred feet east of the west line of Michigan avenue. The tracks of the company along this part of its line were originally laid upon piles driven into the bed of the lake, but the entire space included within its right of way was subsequently filled with earth and converted into firm ground. Inside of this right of way there remained for many years in front of the strip of public ground above described, and of the shore for a considerable distance south, a basin of smooth water, which has been filled up by the city within a few years past, and a part of it improved as a public park. In this way the space between the natural shore and the roadway of the railway company has been reclaimed from the lake, and the ground east of Michigan avenue, now desired for a passenger station-house, has a uniform width of three hundred and ten feet. To that portion of the ground rescued in this artificial manner from the lake, at the expense of the city, it would seem that the General Government has no color of title, it being the settled doctrine of the Supreme Court, laid down in several well-considered cases, that the title to the bed of the great navigable waters of the country is vested in the States respectively and not in the United States. The Government grants and surveys along our great inland lakes and rivers have for this reason never been extended below the limits of high-water.

As to that part of the ground which formed the natural shore, while it has been held that the legal title is still in the General Government, yet it is also clear that it is a bare legal title, divested of any beneficial or equitable interest. The ground has been effectually dedicated to public use, and the Government cannot divert it from that use. In effect, it holds the technical legal title in trust, for the use and benefit of the public and the adjacent property-owners.

It further appears that the parties beneficially interested in the use, namely the State of Illinois, as representing the general public, and all the property owners, with perhaps a single exception, have given their consent to the sale of the ground by the city for the purposes mentioned in the bill. The city of Chicago, as the representative of that portion of the public more immediately concerned, by the unanimous vote of its city council, has asked for this legislation; and no one has appeared before your committee to oppose it. The bill does not interfere with private rights, all such rights being carefully guarded. It proposes merely to grant the consent of Congress to a change from one public use of the property to another, which, in the judgment of those directly interested, has been rendered necessary by the increase of population and business and other circumstances affecting the interests of the public in that quarter of the city.

Your committee are of opinion that the desired consent should be granted. Why should Congress refuse it? If it does refuse, the ground will still remain subject to the use to which it was originally dedicated. The Government can neither sell the land, nor lease it, nor use it. Nor is there any reason to think that it will derive the slightest profit or advantage from maintaining the original dedication. In the price obtained for the adjacent lots it has received pay for the property once, at its full value; and your committee are therefore of opinion that the consent asked for should be granted gratuitously, and without imposing any onerous conditions.

Your committee report the bill, with amendments, and recommend its passage.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the views of the minority, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The views of the minority will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following views, submitted by Mr. EDMUNDS on the 27th instant:

Prior to June, 1837, the United States was the owner, in its political character, as a part of the cession of the Northwest Territory, of a tract of land at Chicago known as the Fort Dearborn reservation, bounded north by the Chicago River and east by Lake Michigan; the southern and western boundaries being upon public lands that had before been disposed of in the usual way. In that year, under the authority of law, the Secretary of war proceeded to lay off into lots and sell several blocks of land to private purchasers, with streets intersecting, and leaving unsold the northerly point of the reservation at the junction of the Chicago River with Lake Michigan, and a quantity of land lying along the lake shore near the southern part of the reservation. On the official plan of the reservation, showing the lots to be sold, this last-named unsold land is left not laid out, and on the plan at that point were entered the words, "Public ground, forever to remain vacant of buildings." In the year 1849 the Supreme Court of the United States, in a case with the city of Chicago, decided that the United States did not stand in the attitude of a mere private owner of the property, and that the public authority of the city of Chicago had not acquired the right to open streets over the unsold portions.

Afterward certain railway companies, acting, as it is said, with the permission of the State of Illinois and the city of Chicago, built a railway track in the shoal water in front of this reservation, and erected freight buildings, &c., outside of the shore-line. It is a fact conceded on all sides that the keeping open of the part marked public ground any longer will be of no benefit to the adjoining proprietors nor to the general public, but that the adjoining property will be increased in value by the erection, on a part of this reserved land, of a railway passenger depot. The railway companies have offered, or are willing to pay, the sum of about $500,000 for that part of this ground so marked as to remain without buildings, and some adjacent ground in which the United States has no proprietary interest, it is said; but it is believed this sum is far below the actual value of the land. This adjacent part, in which the United States has no interest, constitutes only one-third of the ground proposed to be used for this purpose, so that the property of which the United States confessedly owns the fee is worth at least $333,000. Over this land of the United States, under the implied covenant not to build upon it, arising from the entry on the plan before referred to, the people of the city of Chicago have, at most, a right of passage, and the abutting proprietors the right of view. The city of Chicago wishes to surrender its right of passage to the railway company, and the abutting proprietors desire it to be done, as a benefit to their property, and by this bill the United States is to sell all its right in the land, being the absolute ownership of it, subject to the easement of passage and view before mentioned, and allow the city of Chicago to take the whole purchase money. It appears to me that this is simply giving away the property of the United States to a party who has, at most, an easement of passage on it, in order that he may sell it for more than half a million of dollars.

I am unable to see the justice of this. The United States might, with more propriety, ask the reverse. It may be true that the value of the property subject to the easement of passage and view is practically nothing; but it is equally true that the value of the easement is nothing as the subject of sale for any purpose, if indeed such a right could be a subject of sale except as appurtenant to the adjoining property. In this state of the case the most that can be claimed for the city is, that it and the abuttors and the United States stand on equal ground; neither owns anything in the land of any salable value, but each of the three parties are willing that the easements shall be surrendered and the lots sold for business purposes, connected, it is true, (as it is in most cases of business transactions,) with the promotion of local public interest. How can it be right, then, in such a case, that the owners of the easement shall take the whole of the purchase-money and deprive the owner of the fee of any share of it? I think, then, that the United States ought not to be called upon to convey this land without being paid a fair proportion of the purchase-money, and that to do so would be to give several hundred thousand dollars, justly belonging to the Treasury of the United States, to the treasury of the city of Chicago. I am not able, therefore, to agree to the passage of the bill. Aside from this main question, the bill is so framed as, I fear, to expose to danger the rights of the United States in other parts of the Fort Dearborn reservation than that I have especially referred to, to injury, and possibly to the loss of control over the lot marked number "1" on the plan referred to, and the street on the south and west of it, as well as to its water-front.

Respectfully submitted.

GEO. F. EDMUNDS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, in the chair.) There are amendments proposed by the Committee on the Judiciary.

The CHIEF CLERK. The first amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary is, in line 9, after the word "with," to strike out "authority to" and insert "the consent of the United States that said city may."

Mr. EDMUNDS. Inasmuch as the Senate has thought fit to take up this bill now on the suggestion that if it appeared that there were any private rights in danger, or that there was any doubt or difficulty about it, it could then go over, I feel it to be a duty to lay before the Senate and ask to have read a letter from Leonard Swett, and Messrs. Curtis, Earle, and Burdett, counsel for parties objecting, it seems, to this legislation, together with the protest which they have just sent me. How far it bears upon the case I have not had time to see because it was only five minutes before the bill came up that the papers were laid on my desk.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I think I can make an explanation satisfactory even to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That may be; but I presume we ought to do justice to people of the United States who in a respectful way protest against the passage of a bill, however humble and obscure they may be; and inasmuch as these gentlemen say that they have no other opportunity to be heard, and that this bill comes suddenly upon them, and that they represent private rights and private interests, and as they are known to me to be respectable persons, I think they are entitled to a hearing, and I believe they will have it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The papers sent up by the Senator from Vermont will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 28, 1881.

SIR: We beg the favor of your attention to the inclosed protest. Private persons believing they have rights in the tract covered by Senate bill 1935 have incurred large expense in their defense and are in good faith pursuing their remedies in the proper Department and courts. Under such circumstances it seems to them that they may justly ask that any legislation had should contain a proviso protecting their rights by leaving open their remedies.

On behalf of such parties we take the liberty to request (should this view seem to you just) that you offer such amendment as may be effective for that purpose.

We are, very respectfully,

LEONARD SWETT,
CURTIS, EARLE & BURDETT,
For Parties Claimant.

Hon. GEO. F. EDMUNDS,
United States Senate.

Protest against the proposed grant to the city of Chicago, for the benefit of the Illinois Central Railway Company, of lands in said city known as the "lake front," without protection to the legal and equitable owners of portions of the same.

To the honorables the members of the Senate and House of Representatives:

GENTLEMEN: There are now pending before you several bills to confirm to the city of Chicago, for the use of the Illinois Central Railway Company, certain lands of the United States within the said city, generally known as the "lake front tract," and formerly included in the Fort Dearborn military reservation.

The lands embraced in these bills are of very great value, being worth, at a reasonable estimate, not less than $5,000,000.

Aside from the question of transferring for the uses contemplated by the bills, or for any use, such large values without consideration to the United States, we respectfully advise you of the fact that a number of the citizens of the United States claim interests, both legal and equitable, in portions of said tract under the general and special laws relating to the disposal of the lands of the United States; that some of them are prosecuting such rights before the proper department of the Government, and that others have commenced and are prosecuting with due diligence actions at law and suits in equity for the ascertainment and enforcement of their rights. Herewith is exhibited a certified copy of one of the bills in chancery now pending.

Under these circumstances we respectfully protest against the passage of any law which may tend to obstruct the proper legal tribunals in administering the justice demanded by the said claimants, or which may abridge them of any of their rights.

If it shall be deemed best to enact the proposed legislation, we respectfully ask that a proviso be inserted which will fully and effectually protect these and all other private rights.

LEONARD SWETT, Chicago, Illinois.
CURTIS, EARLE & BURDETT,
Washington, District of Columbia, for Parties Claimant.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not think it necessary to take the time of the Senate to read the bill in equity. I do not wish unnecessarily to occupy the time of the Senate in having read, at present, at any rate, for I do not know how material it is, the statements in the bill in equity, a copy of which is submitted with this memorial. They can be referred to in the discussion if it is desirable. It may be that they are important, but, as I said before, I have had no opportunity to read them, for the reason that the papers were only sent to me while I was sitting here as the bill was about to be taken up.

I have this to say on the case as it now stands, and then, for aught I see about it, my duty will be done: so far as it respects private rights of claimants to some portion of this land, it probably would not be difficult to frame an amendment to the bill, if any amendment be necessary, which would protect them, and I presume that no objection would be made to that, because I can hardly suppose that my friend from Illinois would, under any circumstances, assent to the passage of any bill which would disturb private interests.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. This bill does not, and I should like to answer the other point if I have time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You shall have the time. The protection of private interests, which these gentlemen think are not protected by the bill as it stands now, can be provided for.

That brings me, then, to the next question that I think it my duty to call the attention of the Senate to, and that is the vagueness and generalization of the language of the granting part of the bill. The granting clause in the bill is:

That all the right and title of the United States to the streets and grounds dedicated to public use in that part of the city of Chicago, in the State of Illinois, known as "Fort Dearborn addition to Chicago," subdivided and platted under the authority of the Secretary of War in the year 1839, be, and the same hereby is, relinquished and granted to the said city and its successors.

That is a sweeping grant of all the lands of the United States within that division of Fort Dearborn reservation which have been in any way "dedicated to public use." It covers the whole of all the streets and avenues around and between and along the property that has hitherto been sold out to private parties; it covers the whole of all the land occupied by streets and avenues along the lake front where for a long distance there have been no private sales; it covers the whole of the street which bounds on the south—if I recollect the points of the compass correctly—the present public ground of the United States at the very junction of Chicgao River and the lake, as it appears on the map, and is marked No. 1 on the diagram that was submitted to us, where I think there has been and perhaps is now a light-house. What the rest of that ground, a large block apparently, is occupied for, I do not know, and I do not know that any evidence was submitted to the committee about it.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. It is an irregularly shaped piece.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is an irregularly shaped piece and a pretty large piece. There is a frontage which the United States may now use; and assuming—for which assumption I have no authority, because I do not know how the fact is—that this very lot, the most valuable of the whole for business and for public purposes such as light-houses and so on, which lies at the very junction of the river and the lake where they come together though not at a right angle, has not been dedicated to public use, yet the street which surrounds the whole land side of it has in the sense of this bill, because it has been opened and has been used and is being used now. I should be unwilling for one to have the United States cede to the city of Chicago its right to control, to have the dominion over that street on its own land inasmuch as it has property abutting the whole length of that street on one side as well as some property on the other though most of the property on the other side is property sold out into lots. I do not think that would be a very wise thing to do. When you go to the other three sides or the one elliptically curved side the water front goes all around in this form, how much of that water front is being used by the public in some sense and how much of it will pass by this conveyance to the city of Chicago with the right to build up in front of the light-house of the United States any other buildings or structures that it may see fit to put upon that corner of land, I do not know.

My honorable friend in submitting his report and that of the majority of the committee seems to think that the law is clear, that the land under water in front of the property of the United States belongs to the State, and as a consequence (although they do not seem to say that) that the United States owning a lot of land of this kind, and subject to no public easement at all, I will say, have no riparian rights whatever, and hence that it would be within the competence of the State of Illinois to authorize to-day the whole of that front around this corner reservation that I am now speaking of, to be built up with warehouses, docks, railroad stations, and other things, and thus cut off the approach to the land of the United States by water entirely.

I have not got sufficiently wise in the law to understand that to be the true state of the law. The Supreme Court of the United States has decided more than once, and I think rightly, that when the United States have parted with their title to the lands that they own in a State which border on the public waters of the State or of the United States, they have also parted with their dominion of the land under the water in front of the sold lands, and that they have no right to go and grant outside of that line public lands as the subjects of conveyance. I understand that to be the law, and I think it ought to be; but that is quite a different question both practically and legally from saying, as the committee seem to imply, that where the United States, either in its sovereign character or as a private owner, is the proprietor of land lying upon the shore of navigable water, the United States has no riparian rights whatever, and therefore would have no right (if this were its private property subject to no easement at all,) to sell this land with the right to build a wharf out in front of it.

So then this bill in its first clause containing this general grant of all the rights of the United States in the whole of the Fort Dearborn addition to Chicago, containing this most valuable lot at the junction of the river and the lake, as it appears to me, will give pretty strong ground for somebody to say hereafter that we have surrendered to the city of Chicago all the dominion as a riparian or as a sovereign proprietor over this land, which they say is not covered by this bill. That can be corrected by an amendment if they do not mean it; if they do mean it it is better to leave the bill as it is.

My honorable friend also says in his report that the land under water in front of this place, that was not to be built upon, belonged to the State, and that the State gave it to the Illinois Central Railroad Company, and therefore that the amount of pecuniary interest which the United States could have in this property under any circumstances is much less than it would otherwise be. If my friend is right in his premises he is right in his conclusion; but inasmuch as the consent of the United States was never given to the passage of this railway over the riparian front of this property of the United States I disagree with him. If the United States has the property in the land it has the property also, or whatever it may be, the riparian right in front of the land, although, as has happened in a great many other cases, the Illinois Central Railroad Company being a pretty strong corporation, stronger than the United States I dare say, has chosen to take possession of it and occupy it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of half past one having arrived, the Chair will lay before the Senate its unfinished business, which is the bill (S. No. 1773) to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians on the various reservations, and to extend the protection of the laws of the States and Territories over the Indians, and for other purposes.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that it be informally laid aside to go on with this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to laying aside the unfinished business informally that the bill under consideration at the close of the morning hour may be continued?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not think it ought to be laid aside, because as I said before I do not think there has been a fair chance for the people who are opposed to this bill, as they are respectable people in Chicago, to be heard.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator from Vermont let me make a suggestion to him? I suggest to him that it would be fair to let the regular order be laid aside at least long enough for some member of the committee to make a brief statement in reply to what the Senator has said.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have no objection to that.

Mr. CONKLING. I am quite frank for one in saying that I do not care to go out to the public as having concurred in a report which is obnoxious to all the objections the honorable Senator has made; and therefore I would be glad at this time if an opportunity might be given to the Senator from Illinois or to some member of the committee to state the view, however mistaken that view may have been, which the committee took, in answer to the observations of the honorable Senator from Vermont.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order, then, will be informally laid aside.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have not nearly concluded what I wish to say. I have not come to the main point of this bill, but I should be glad to hear my friend from Illinois now.

Mr. CONKLING. Why does not the Senator conclude?

Mr. EDMUNDS. It will take me an hour.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I hope the Senator from Vermont will finish.

Mr. COKE. I am willing to yield the unfinished business for a while, with the understanding that it may be called up at any time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the understanding of the Senator.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I think if the Senate sufficiently understood this case they would see that it was not subject to the criticism which has been passed upon it by the Senator from Vermont. In 1839 the United States laid out the Fort Dearborn addition to Chicago, and believing that it would be better for the sale of lands that there should be public open ground fronting upon all lots, they designated upon that plat that this public ground should not be occupied by buildings. That plat has been recognized by the General Government and action taken upon it in granting lands. The property-holders were undoubtedly interested in having that remain a public square. At that time the best resident portion of Chicago was in this addition along Michigan avenue on Lake Michigan. Now, by the change of circumstances, it is not used at all as residence property, but must be used for business purposes.

The General Government could have had nothing else than a fee-simple title, subject to its use by the people of Chicago. They have no right or interest in the matter otherwise than that. Now the simple matter is, shall that use be changed; shall that remain as it is now, a public park, or shall a portion of it at least—we ask but a very small portion of it—be used by the city for the purposes of a grand railway depot for several important railroads? The people who own lots fronting this public square ask for it; the State of Illinois asks for it; and my colleague and myself, who represent the people of Chicago, say that they ask for it; and they know all about this thing. When I left Chicago in December I did not hear a dissenting voice upon this subject.

Now the simple inquiry is, shall the United States, who have granted the fee-simple title to this land subject to its use, consent that the use shall be changed? That is all there is in the case.

It is well for the Senate to understand that this public plat of the ground that we ask for runs from Randolph street on the north to Madison street on the south. When this ground was laid out, Michigan avenue was not extended from Randolph street to Madison street; it was afterward extended by the city; but in 1839, at the time this plat was made, the lake shore was fifty feet from Michigan avenue east at Randolph street and one hundred feet at Madison street. In 1852, by abrasion, at Randolph street, there were but twenty-one and a half feet between the avenue and the lake, and at Madison street there was nothing at all; it had all gone into the lake by the process of erosion; and that process was cutting away the shore of the lake along the entire east front of the city. In 1852 the charter of the Illinois Central Railroad was granted by the State of Illinois. The inner line of that road was within four hundred feet from the lake shore. Three hundred feet of the right of way were given in the lake, and for thirty years the railroad has had possession of that right of way.

Mr. CONKLING. Was the railroad laid on piles?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. The railroad was laid on piles in the lake, at great expense. The company agreed to fill this in with earth and to erect a breakwater; and it is in consequence of the erection of that breakwater that this whole front of the lake has been saved to the city and State.

Mr. CONKLING. Did the railroad company pay for the breakwater, the piling, and the filling in?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Yes, sir; paid for everything connected with it, large sums of money. That left stagnant water along the lake shore; but between Randolph and Madison streets, which is the only ground now in controversy, some years after the right of way was filled in with earth, the city of Chicago went to work and reclaimed that.

Recollect that before the Illinois Central Railroad went there, by the process of abrasion the lake was gradually encroaching on the shore, had cut it off in one place one hundred feet and in another over thirty feet; and by the erection of this breakwater, if I may so term it, of the Illinois Central Railroad, by putting down these piles and filling up with earth, they were enabled to fill up the water between the inner line and the lake shore. That is really the land that the city asks to lease or sell to the Illinois Central Railroad for depot purposes for themselves and for several other important railroads. That is all. The rest of Dearborn Park, as it is called there now, is preserved; there is no proposition to do anything with that. Of this original ground there is the smallest possible portion yet as it was when the plat was laid out in 1839.

Mr. CONKLING. And the residue of it is artificially made ground?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Artificially made ground. I do not want to go into a discussion of the legal question with my friend from Vermont, because there is not time. I should like to do it if there was time. It is artificially made ground that the city of Chicago asks, through her Senators on this floor, who know her whishes, the privilege of leasing or selling to this railroad company for that grand object. The people who own these lots wish this use changed.

There is no use of this property to them as it is now. All the ground down there is used for business purposes; and if they can have a magnificent depot, costing two or three million dollars, they conceive that they are more benefited by it than by letting this park remain as it is.

Is the Government of the United States to pursue a "dog-in-the-manger" policy and say "you shall not change the use?" Why should not the use be changed when the public call for it? The public in Chicago call for it, and the public in the State of Illinois call for it; and the property owners, the only persons who are interested, call for it.

Now, Mr. President, a word about this Valentine land-scrip which is introduced in the Senate. That was not before the committee at all. I understood last night that there was something about it, but I think any gentleman who will listen to me five minutes will be satisfied that there is nothing in it.

In 1842, Micheltorena, governor of Mexico, granted to Miranda a large tract of land. Ortega and Valentine presented their claims before the land commissioners of California in 1853; they presented themselves as adverse claimants. Valentine dropped out for some reason by his own laches and neglect. So far as Ortega's heirs are concerned, the claim came up in various stages and was finally rejected by the Supreme Court, having been rejected by the land commission, and its decision affirmed. Then Valentine came before Congress, and, although it was his own laches that he had not presented his claim, Congress in the abundance of its charity and mercy gave him the privilege of going ahead, and, if possible, proving his claims to all these lands that in consequence of his laches were owned by homestead people and had been sold at public sale and private entry. Now Congress said he should not have a title to these lands, even if he proved it, because by his own neglect he had lost it:

> But in lieu thereof the claimant or his legal representatives may select, and shall be allowed, patents for an equal quantity of the unoccupied and unappropriated public lands of the United States, not mineral, and in tracts not less than the subdivisions provided for in the United States land laws.

Now, sir, would you suppose it possible that that Valentine scrip was sought to be located upon this piece of made land in the city of Chicago? Stating that particular proposition, would you suppose it possible? I heard of this thing last night. The Valentine scrip claim was rejected by the Secretary of the Interior. The land on which Thomas B. Valentine attempted to locate his scrip was that part of the new-made land which lies between the natural shore, as it existed in 1821, when the first official Government survey was made, and the present margin of the lake. Just think of such a thing! A Commissioner of the Land Office smelt that out, I understand, and resigned his office, on the ground that here were four or five million dollars awaiting his action, from which he could get large fees as counsel. The Secretary of the Interior properly held that there was no such public land belonging to the Government, and if there were, that a part of that ground was occupied, and had been for nearly thirty years, by the railroad company, and the residue had been appropriated by the United States to public use in 1839. The Valentine scrip could be located only on the "unoccupied and unappropriated public lands of the United States." The land in question was not "unoccupied" or "unappropriated;" nor was it "public land" within the meaning of the act of Congress.

Mr. President, this decision of the Secretary is in accordance with two decisions of the Supreme Court, in which I wrote the opinions, namely, Leavenworth, Lawrence and Galveston Railroad Company vs. United States, (92 U. S. Reports, 733;) Newhall vs. Sanger, (92 U. S. Reports, 761.) In the first of these cases it was held that the term "public lands" is used in our legislation to describe such lands as are subject to sale or other disposition under general laws, and to which a complete title is vested in the Government. No other land is subject to survey and division into sections. Hence, a grant of "land" in general terms cannot be construed to embrace lands in the possession of an Indian tribe, to the use and occupancy of which they are entitled by treaties so long as they may choose to occupy the same. The grant embraces only such lands as could be sold and enjoyed, for Congress cannot be supposed to have thereby intended to include land previously appropriated to another purpose. The policy which dictates such grants confines them to lands which Congress could rightfully bestow without disturbing existing relations and producing vexatious conflicts. As the transfer of any part of an Indian reservation secured by treaty would also involve a gross breach of the public faith, the presumption is conclusive that Congress never meant to grant it.

These reasons are equally conclusive that Congress never intended, by the use of the words "unoccupied and unappropriated public lands of the United States," used in the act for the relief of Valentine, to allow lands to be selected by him in the heart of a large city, which had been dedicated by the United States to the public forty years ago, and had been for that length of time in the actual enjoyment of the public.

In the second case above cited (Newhall vs. Sanger) it was held that lands within the boundaries of an alleged Mexican or Spanish grant, which was sub judice, are not public lands within the meaning of the land-grant acts, and that they do not become public lands until the question of title is settled. If the claim under the alleged grant be finally rejected the lands then fall into the category of public lands; but the judicial rejection of the claim cannot be antedated so as to render operative a grant of public lands, made in general terms, which would be otherwise without effect; which cuts this case up by the roots. It is so preposterous that it would hardly seem any decision need have been rendered on the case.

The decision of Secretary Schurz in the Valentine case being to the effect that there were no such public lands belonging to the United States as those selected by Valentine, that decision is understood to be final and conclusive in the absence of fraud. (See Vance vs. Burbank, 101 U. S., 519; Marquez vs. Frisbie, 101 U. S., 473; and cases there cited.)

The bill reported from the committee does not, however, affect in any way any legal right or claim of Valentine. The bill simply relinquishes to the city of Chicago the right and title of the United States, whatever it is. It could not deprive either Valentine or any one else of any property, right, or interest in the public grounds.

Now, Mr. President, in relation to block 1 at the head of the lake, my friend from Vermont certainly knew that that was not within the purview of this bill, and I have prepared this section to be added:

That nothing in this act contained shall be held to impair or in any way affect the right or title of the United States in or to block 1 in said Fort Dearborn addition to Chicago.

I do not know whether it belongs to the United States or not, or whether it has ever been sold; but at any rate this provision will secure that. There was no intention whatever to take that in.

Mr. CONKLING. Does the Senator offer that amendment?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I offer that amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You had better say "block 1 or streets or waters surrounding it."

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I am perfectly willing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There are a number of amendments reported by the Committee on the Judiciary to be acted upon. The amendment of the Senator from Illinois will be received and acted on in order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, the statement of my friend from Illinois in respect to the situation of this land in regard to filling, is not precisely in accordance with the representations that I understand to be made in the printed application and brief in favor of the passage of this bill, and to which the drawing that I hold in my hand, a copy of the original plat of survey, is attached; and from this it appears that the shore line is a good way outside of Michigan avenue. It is true that this plat was made a long time ago, in 1837.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I think I have stated it correctly in my report.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am only speaking of the facts we had before the committee; and as I understood from statements made before the committee and from the statements of the counsel of one of the railroad companies that were made to me as one of a sub-committee (which has been referred to: otherwise I should not have referred to any sub-committee,) there has been and is large ground between what would be the extended east line of Michigan avenue and the lake at the narrowest place, or a part of the way; I do not remember the precise detail nor do I think it very material.

Now, Mr. President, my friend from Illinois having been heard as my friend from New York desired that he should be, and inasmuch as what I have to say regarding the other part of this bill—the real situation of the respective interests of this property—will take some time; and still more for the reason I stated when I asked that the bill be not taken up until to-morrow, I call for the regular order. I shall not object to my friend taking up the bill to-morrow and going on with it.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. But suppose I cannot get it up to-morrow? Is it not better that we settle this now? The Senator from Vermont cannot take a half-hour, I think. The chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs is willing to defer his bill a little while longer. I do not know that we can get this up to-morrow. My friend from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] has a resolution about the presidential count, and the chairman of the Committee on Pensions [Mr. WITHERS] wants to take up pension bills. It seems to me it would be no more than fair to let me have a vote on this to-day.

Mr. INGALLS. I suppose the Senator from Illinois, if he desires the further consideration of this bill, can move it. There is no parliamentary obstacle to the further consideration of this bill as I understand, the morning hour having expired.

Mr. CONKLING. There is certainly no technical reason why the Senator from Illinois cannot move to postpone the unfinished business. There is, however, a reason of courtesy which would stand in the Senator's way. The honorable Senator from Texas, chairman of the committee having charge of the other bill, has been very obliging in allowing, after the expiration of the morning hour, this bill and the Senator from Illinois to proceed. I can readily understand, therefore, that the Senator from Illinois does not like to submit a motion now, the effect of which would be, if it carried, to displace the business which the honorable Senator from Texas has in charge, and in respect of which he has been so courteous and obliging. Therefore I wish that we might, if we could, continue by consent the consideration of this bill in the hope of getting a vote upon it, or at least in the hope of getting out the facts as far as they exist, if in truth they were not fully before the committee. The Senator from Illinois says that the Senator from Texas is quite agreed further to accommodate him and to allow this bill to proceed. I suggest that at least those Senators who wish to say anything about it might be allowed to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont has called for the general order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I hope I shall not be misunderstood about this business; but if I be, I cannot help it. The matter is of course of not the slightest personal interest to me; but I think it is not very unusual in this body when a bill of this character first comes up, if some member of the committee thinks he is obtaining information which bears upon it and wishes to have it go over for a day before he proceeds to conclude what he has to say about it, to grant such a postponement. There are courtesies on both sides. It was with that view, and not with any special reference to the Indian bill, that I called for the regular order. Of course it is in the power of the Senate to deny to me the right to further examine this bill and get to understand the information which by letter and otherwise is being communicated to me, in which there may be nothing at all. I do not intend to commit myself to anybody's representations until I find out what they mean. I should be glad to have it done; and if the Senate is unwilling to do that, then of course I must submit.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I said that it need not take more than ten minutes for the Senate to understand this bill. I meant precisely what I said. The majority of the committee—all of the Committee on the Judiciary but one—report in favor of the bill. The Senator from Vermont makes a minority report; but, if I understand him, he does not object to the release provided for in the bill; all that he asks is that if the railroad companies pay any consideration for the conveyance or lease by the city of Chicago to them, the United States shall share in that consideration. If I am right in this, there is no objection to the release, and the only question is whether the United States shall exact its portion of the purchase-money that may be paid by the railroads. We considered that matter very fully in committee, and we thought the United States had been paid once, and that it had no salable interest, and that it would not be becoming the Government to ask any part whatever of this purchase-money. That is our opinion; that is my opinion; I entertain it very strongly; and now, if I am right in this, if there is no objection to the release, and it is a simple question whether or not the United States shall demand a part of this purchase-money, that I take it is so small a matter that unless some Senator feels moved to speak further we might as well vote on the bill at once.

Mr. LOGAN. I rise to make a suggestion to the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, who has charge of the bill which is the regular order. Of course I can speak for no one but myself; but being on that committee I shall certainly render him any assistance I can to have his bill disposed of; and I presnme there will be no objection if that bill shall be laid aside for the purpose of disposing of this bill, to replacing that in its order as soon as this bill is disposed of. I think everybody will be willing to do that, and we can take it up right after this and go on with it. I should be very glad if the Senator from Texas would allow that to be done, so that this bill may be disposed of. It is a matter of very great importance to the constituents of my colleague and myself, and we fear that unless it is disposed of now it may not have a chance for a fair hearing again.

Mr. COKE. I am very anxious to have the bill which is the unfinished business disposed of. It has already occupied considerable time. Still, if I can maintain the position of that bill before the Senate as the unfinished business, I am perfectly willing to yield temporarily to the bill of the Senators from Illinois.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order has been demanded, and must be proceeded with unless a motion is made to postpone it, as the Chair understands the rules.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is clear enough. If my friend from Illinois is unwilling to allow this bill to be postponed until to-morrow——

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Wait a moment. I am perfectly willing——

Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend will allow me to state my position. I say if he is willing to allow this bill to go over until to-morrow in order that a very small and weak minority of the committee may have a little more time to understand what the representations are that are made to him by letter and in these protests and other letters that have not been read mean, and which representations were not before the committee at all, I shall be glad. If he is not willing to do that, perhaps my duty will be done by finishing what I have to say now.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. The Senator has no right to throw that insinuation by covering his question with innuendoes and suggestions that these letters show so and so. I am as open as day upon this bill; I want to conceal nothing about it. I represent with my colleague that constituency, and I think I know their views. I have no sort of objection to this bill going over until to-morrow, if I can have it disposed of to-morrow.

Mr. ALLISON. Why not agree that it shall be taken up to-morrow after the morning hour?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Very well.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I said before that I should help to get it up to-morrow.

Mr. ALLISON. Then I ask unanimous consent that this bill be taken up to-morrow after the morning hour.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. After the hour of half past one?

Mr. ALLISON. After the morning business.

Mr. COKE. I would ask the Senator from Iowa to explain what he means by "morning hour."

Mr. ALLISON. At the conclusion of the morning business. I think we can finish the bill in charge of the Senator from Texas to-day.

Mr. COKE. But if we fail to do so I shall still claim for it its position as the unfinished business of the Senate for to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa suggests that this bill be taken up to-morrow after the routine business of the morning hour has been gone through with. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that is the understanding.

Mr. HARRIS. Within the morning hour?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. After the routine business of the morning hour shall have been disposed of.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Before this subject passes away now, I wish to assure my friend from Illinois that he did me injustice in speaking of insinuations. I made none; I had none in my mind; but I did state just as I hope he would if the cases were reversed and it was Burlington, Vermont, that was interested, that I wanted to understand what these letters, which I am receiving, mean, and I stated also that I did not know that there was anything in them at all. I certainly meant nothing to reflect on either of my friends from Illinois; they may be sure of that.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I rose to say, but the Senator would not give place to me, that I was perfectly willing to have the bill considered to-morrow, provided it could be done. Then the Senator went on and stated about these various things that he had received from Chicago or elsewhere as if I was unwilling that the light should be turned on.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, I did not say you were unwilling that the light should be turned on.

Mr. ALLISON. This matter is understood to be the regular order for to-morrow after the routine business of the morning hour.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Is it understood that this will be the regular order to-morrow after the morning hour?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is understood that the bill will be taken up after the routine business of the morning hour shall have been gone through with.

Mr. WALLACE. Not displacing the Indian severalty bill in charge of my friend from Texas?

Mr. ALLISON. Of course not.

AMENDMENT TO APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. VEST submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 6972) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

SPANISH CLAIMS.

Mr. MORGAN submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to furnish to the Senate a statement of the name of each claimant whose claim has been allowed by any court, judge, or commissioner, acting under the laws of the United States enacted to carry into effect the ninth article of the treaty with Spain, proclaimed February 22, 1821, and the amount allowed on each claim by such court, judge, or commissioner, and the amount paid on each claim by the Government of the United States, and the date of the judgment, order, or decree rendered in each case, and the date of the payment made thereon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think it will be somewhat expensive to get all that information; but I do not object if the chairman of the Committee on Finance does not.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. FARLEY. I ask to take from the Calendar the bill (S. No. 1210) for the relief of certain officers of the Navy, for the purpose of considering the bill now. It will take but a very short time. I move to postpone the pending order for that purpose. If the discussion in determining upon the passage of the bill shall take any time, I will consent that it go over until to-morrow, so as not to interfere with the pending order; but I want to take the bill from the Calendar that it may be before the Senate. It has been passed once by this body; has been reported twice by the Committee on Naval Affairs, and is amply recommended. It is important that the bill should be passed at this stage of the session so that it may go to the other House. The substance of the bill is for the relief of certain naval officers who have passed an examination by the board of admirals created for that purpose. My judgment is that the consideration of the bill will require no debate. The persons interested are very anxious about it, and I have tried on four or five occasions to have the bill taken up. I earnestly ask the Senate to consider it at this time; and I say to the Senator from Texas that if it takes any time I will consent that it go over until to-morrow.

Mr. COKE. I cannot yield any further unless I am voted down by the Senate.

Mr. ROLLINS. I will say that I think the bill which the Senator from California wishes to have considered will take some time.

Mr. COKE. We desire to go on with the consideration of the Indian severalty bill. I am informed by a Senator that the bill proposed to be taken up by the Senator from California will lead to a great deal of debate. I have already yielded now more than an hour, and I do not think I can yield further in the interest of the bill which I have in charge.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I fully concur in everything that has been said by the Senator from California in regard to the bill which he asks the Senate to consider. It is really a very hard case. In 1878 the Committee on Naval Affairs reported the bill, which does nothing more than justice to two of the most meritorious officers of the naval service, to whom great injustice had been done, as I claim——

Mr. INGALLS. The Chair will remember the rule that a discussion upon the merits of a bill is not in order on a motion to proceed to its consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no motion to proceed to the consideration of the bill named.

Mr. HARRIS. What is the question pending before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business is before the Senate.

Mr. HARRIS. I understood that the Senator from Texas called for the regular order, and I was not aware of the fact that any motion was pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order is now before the Senate.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I do not wish to antagonize the bill now before the Senate, but I should like to have the unanimous consent of the Senate to take up and pass a bill that relates to the Territories which have no representative here. As I say, the Territories have no representative here, and each Senator has to consider himself as the agent and representative of a people of that kind. The bill is a House bill which has been referred to a standing committee and is reported back without amendment, and I think it will be passed without any objection whatever.

Mr. COKE. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order will be proceeded with. The Senator from Texas objects to giving way any further.

LANDS IN SEVERALTY TO INDIANS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1773) to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians on the various reservations and to extend the protection of the laws of the States and Territories over the Indians, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. PLUMB in section 5, line 15, after the word "void," to insert:

And provided further, That the lands so allotted may be leased for such term and on such conditions as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. PLUMB. I move to amend the bill by inserting after the word "act," in section 2, line 13, the following words:

The lands to be so subdivided and allotted as to give to each and every person who is a member of either of said tribes of Indians, and entitled by birth, marriage, adoption, or otherwise, to their proportionate share of said lands as hereinafter provided. Rolls containing the names of all persons entitled to a distributive share in the land of such tribe or band shall be made out and certified by the chiefs of said tribes or bands, the same to be forwarded to the Secretary of the Interior as soon as practicable, and be by him approved;

So as to read:

Where the improvements of two or more Indians have been made on the same legal subdivision of land, unless they shall otherwise agree, a provisional line may be run, dividing said lands between them, and the amount to which each is entitled shall be equalized in the assignment of the remainder of the land to which they are entitled under this act, the lands to be so subdivided and alloted as to give to each and every Indian, &c.

The trouble about the bill in regard to the matter of allotments is that there is no way of ascertaining who are members of the respective tribes. My proposition is that the chiefs of the tribes shall make out rolls for this purpose, which shall be sent to the Secretary of the Interior, and by him approved. Then there will be a basis for the allotment. Unless there be some provision authorizing the ascertainment of that fact, the persons whose duty it may be to make the allotment will proceed wholly in the dark.

Mr. COKE. I hope the amendment will not be adopted. The bill covers the whole ground amply, and has been so constructed as to be harmonious. I cannot see that the amendment will in any way improve it, but, on the contrary, will make it somewhat objectionable.

Mr. PLUMB. I think the Senator from Texas did not quite catch the scope of the amendment proposed. It is almost literally the provision of a bill reported from his committee—the Committee on Indian Affairs—with reference to the allotment of lands in severalty to the Peorias, Piankeshaws, and Quapaws, and the other confederated tribes of the Indian Territory. I think the Senator is quite mistaken in saying that the bill provides fully for the subject-matter of the amendment. If the commissioners go to a reservation for the purpose of allotting these lands, if the bill should ever become a law, it will be necessary that they should have some basis on which to proceed. They must know who are members of the tribe, and how are they to find out? Under this amendment the chiefs themselves will make out the rolls and send them to the Secretary of the Interior, by whom they are to be approved.

The question of tribal membership is one of those things which a person outside is not competent to settle alone. Persons are drawn into a tribe by affinities of various kinds, and become as much members of the tribe, although they may have been born elsewhere, as though they were of the blood of the tribe. An instance in point may be cited in the case of the Osages and the Quapaws. A couple of years ago, for the purpose of locating the Poncas in the Indian Territory, the Indian Department provided for the migration of the Quapaws from their reservation to that of the Osages, in order to take them away from the reservation designed for the Poncas. A portion only of the tribe went away, the Osages consenting. They located there among the Osages; they remain there to this day, and are there now. A short time ago the Quapaws who remained on their reservation brought the matter to the attention of the Interior Department that some measures might be taken to reunite the tribe. Thereupon the Osages held a council and resolved that they desired that the Quapaws should remain there on their reservation and become a part of their tribe. The Quapaws themselves expressed a similar desire; and there has been practically for all purposes of association, and as far as they can, for the sharing of community rights, an incorporation of that part of the Quapaw tribe into the Osage tribe. If that is satisfactory to them should it be unsatisfactory to anybody else? Indians become members of other tribes, white men become members by marriage, by adoption, with no particular form it is true, but it amounts substantially to an incorporation into the tribe. When this measure comes to take effect, if it does, and is to be carried out——

Mr. COKE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question? When an Indian of another tribe is incorporated in the manner referred to by the Senator, is he not then a member of that tribe, and are not the tribes all provided for in the bill.

Mr. PLUMB. When the commission or whatever authority goes to a reservation for the purpose of allotting these lands, it must take some tribal authority as to who are members of the tribe, or else it cannot determine with any accuracy who are the members. The amendment provides simply how it shall be ascertained through the tribal authority who are the members of the tribe.

I do not know that I quite understood the purport of the question of the Senator from Texas; but if I did it was that if a member of the Quapaws, we will say, for instance, happens to be with the Osages, if he is not provided for among the Osages he may be among the Quapaws; but the trouble about that is that he may be with the Osages when the allotments are made for the Osages, and he may not be with the Quapaws when the allotments are made there. If he desires to be with the Osages and to take his chances with that community for property, for association, and for his tribal or other relation, and the Osages are willing, that ought to settle it; the Government ought not to interfere; because if you once commence to draw the line you will have to draw it in a great many cases. There are Arapahoes among the Cheyennes, and the reverse; there are Cheyennes among the Comanches. Members of all these tribes perhaps are among the Kiowas; and the Southern Cheyennes and Northern Cheyennes are more or less affiliated. Unless you have some tribunal, and that too a tribunal within the tribe, which shall have the power and the authority to settle the question of the membership of the tribe, the allotment of lands in severalty will not be a settlement at all of the questions in which the tribes are interested.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. PLUMB.] [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it.

Mr. PLUMB. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee what possible objection there can be to the amendment. It seems to me it is a useful provision.

Mr. COKE. My objection to it is that it cumbers the bill with something that is not necessary. It is within the sound discretion of the Interior Department in executing the bill to take such measures as will accomplish the purpose that the amendment of the Senator from Kansas proposes to accomplish, and it can be done just as well without his amendment as with it under the bill as already constructed.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not understand that the bill as it has been prepared and reported from the committee gives to the Secretary of the Interior the power to determine what Indians belong to a certain tribe by nativity, by consanguinity, or by adoption. The Senator from Kansas has very properly said that in every tribe of Indians there are some who claim to be Indians of that particular tribe by adoption. The object of the amendment, as I understand it, is to furnish to the Government an authentic statement from the heads of the Indian tribes as to those persons who are living with them who are really members of the tribe, and that that is all of it, so that they will be entitled to their lands in that tribe, instead of going somewhere else to get them. Nothing, it seems to me, can be simpler than that, and it is altogether necessary that the amendment should be adopted.

The Senator from Texas says the amendment destroys the harmony of the bill. He has not suggested wherein the harmony of the bill is disturbed by it at all, and surely this is not a procrustean bed that is made for us here, upon which we are to be measured and tied down, without the opportunity of saying a word or offering an amendment, for fear we might disturb the harmony of the bill. If there is anything in the bill that needs to be disturbed, it is the harmony of it, or rather the inharmony of it, as will be seen by reference to various of its provisions.

The Senate I think has a friendly desire to make out of this measure something that is really valuable and something that will go into operation. It seems to me that it is not a sufficient argument against a proposition to amend the bill in such an essential particular as the Senator from Kansas has suggested, that it may disturb the harmony or theory of the bill as it rests in the mind of the Senator from Texas or the committee. It cannot be denied that there should be some provision in the measure by which the tribal relation of every Indian in a tribe shall be ascertained authentically, and in accordance with the usage of the particular tribe. That is all that is proposed by the amendment. If it is the object of the committee to vote down every amendment, then, as a matter of course, if the Senate sustains the committee in that, and they are enabled to have the bill just as it is, all debate, all propositions to amend, are entirely useless. I do not think it is a sufficient answer to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas that it does not, according to the views of the Senator from Texas, comport with the harmony of the bill. The bill leaves out that feature, and it ought to be put into it in order to make it a useful, serviceable, and just measure.

Mr. COKE. The bill has already amply provided for the very thing attempted to be provided for by the amendment of the Senator from Kansas. It directs the President when in his judgment it is proper, and an Indian tribe desires it, to allot lands to the individuals of the tribe. How can the President allot lands to the individuals of a tribe without first ascertaining who those individuals are? It devolves upon the President and upon the Indian Department under this bill to ascertain who the Indians are belonging to each tribe, who is entitled in the tribe, as a matter of course, before they can make the allotment to the individuals of the tribe.

I do not wish to cumber the bill with unnecessary amendments; and besides I have a great deal of doubt as to whether many of the amendments that are being offered to the bill are intended for any other purpose than to load it down so that it will be impossible to pass it. I do not mean to say that it is anybody's intention to do that, but I do mean to say that the amendments which have been tendered to the bill are offered by gentlemen who have shown no friendship for the purposes sought to be attained by the bill.

I oppose this amendment because it is unnecessary. I will oppose no amendment that I believe to be necessary or proper. The committee has already accepted one amendment and will perhaps accept others; but we do not choose to take counsel or advice, or receive the lectures of gentlemen who while they profess to be friendly to the bill are using every possible means to defeat it, and whose amendments, and substitutes, and motions to strike out, if they had prevailed, would have left hardly the enacting clause of the original bill standing.

Mr. PLUMB. If the Senator from Texas referred to me as in the slightest degree offering amendments for the purpose of impairing the bill as a practical measure, he is entirely mistaken. I believe that the bill as it is now is not calculated to carry out the purpose for which it was intended; and if I give the committee credit for good intentions I am at least a little ahead of them there, because they have not given that to me. I do give the committee credit for intending to settle the Indian question by this bill; and I am reminded of a remark that was made to me by a gentleman yesterday, who said he would vote for the bill because he thought it would settle both the Indian question and the Indians at the same time. I desire to recognize to the fullest extent, in the legislation in the adoption of which I shall participate, the obligations of humanity to the Indian and the obligations of law as well. I want any measure that may be passed to be substantially a finality of this question. I have the best of reasons for desiring it. No Indian war and no trouble with an Indian of any kind occurs except such as occurs in the western country, because that unfortunately is the only place where there are any Indians with whom we have trouble; and wherever that trouble occurs it gives rise to the statements made freely that the western people have provoked the conflict, have made the trouble, by reason of their disposition to encroach upon the rights of Indians. I want this or any bill that may be passed to so settle the question as that we may no longer come under that reproach. I do not say that it has been deserved heretofore; I say it has not been deserved.

The bill relates to the adjustment of relations that are to be permanent, to the settlement of boundaries between the property of Indians and white men by whom they are to be surrounded. It is desirable that the bill shall receive the utmost consideration; and as much as I respect the Committee on Indian Affairs of the Senate and the chairman of that committee, I am not willing to subordinate my judgment to his upon the statement which he substantially makes, that this bill is the sum of human wisdom upon this subject. I think the bill can be amended in such a way as to accomplish the object that he has in mind. He differs with me, as a matter of course, as he has a right to do; but I beg him to take notice that the offering of amendments to this bill is not an indictable offense and ought not to be referred to on the floor of the Senate as exceeding the prerogative of a member of this body.

The Senator from Texas says in substance that the President of the United States has got to do this or else he cannot carry out the provisions of the bill, and he proposes that the President of the United States shall take the power to do these things by implication and not by direction, and that Congress shall not say what machinery the President shall use in order to carry it out. I propose to put into the hands of the President of the United States ample power to carry out the provisions of the bill, if it shall be passed, in such a way that he shall not have arbitrary power, but that he shall have power within certain limits. Suppose the President in the exercise of the power implied under this bill says that a certain Indian is not a member of the tribe and sets him out on the prairies; suppose he says that of a hundred Indians; then we shall have so many non-reservation Indians, Indians not provided for at all, and we shall be called upon at the very next session of Congress to appropriate money to feed them, to support them. That act of the President, by the misuse of the discretion which he is said to have under this bill, may produce not only a great wrong to the Indians themselves but to the people of the United States who will be called on to support them as well. I want the bill made sufficiently plain in its terms; I want the scope of the powers of the President under it to be sufficiently enlarged, and at the same time put within proper limits, so that we may know precisely what he is going to do, and what the result of his action will probably be.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not know how often I shall be compelled to disclaim any disposition to antagonize this bill, because of the fact that I have some views about it which I think ought to be incorporated in it by way of amendment. I have made the disclaimer heretofore, and I now reassert that I am in harmony with the purposes of this bill, but I do not believe that it is a bill calculated to effect the purposes it was intended to accomplish. So far as I have had anything to do with an attempt to perfect the bill, it has been merely to save it from an act of felo de se. I am entirely satisfied that if the bill is passed in its present form, it is incapable of being executed, and desiring the principle of the bill to be carried into effect, I wish to put it in a form where it can be executed.

The Senator from Texas has not informed us how the President is going to be informed as to who are the members of a tribe. The Senator from Kansas is attempting to get into the bill a provision by which the ruling men, the chiefs of the tribes, may bring testimony before the proper recording agent as to those persons who belong to a tribe. It has been suggested by a Senator near me—and I will call the attention of the Senator from Kansas to the suggestion—that the bill might open the door for the adoption into a tribe hereafter of white men, who might be enterprising, with a view of getting into the tribe and getting the benefit of the Indian reservation. I suggest to him, if the amendment is liable to that objection, that he amend it by inserting "any Indians adopted," so as to exclude the idea that a white man can be adopted hereafter into the body of the tribe, and thereby receive the benefits of the reservation.

Mr. PLUMB. So far as that part is concerned, I do not know that I would have any objection, and still there are white men who have intermarried with Indians and who have been so intermarried for a great many years. It is the custom among the Cherokees and Choctaws, (and I believe they embody not only all the sum of Indian wisdom, but of all other wisdom,) to not only permit these intermarriages but to adopt the person so intermarried and to give him all the benefits which the original members of the tribe had in the property.

Mr. MORGAN. Then I suggest to the Senator that he so modify his amendment as to say "persons heretofore adopted," so as to cut off the possibility to which I have alluded.

Mr. PLUMB. I am entirely willing that that should be done. I was going to call the attention of the Senator from Alabama to the fact that the rolls to be made by the chiefs are not to be final, but they are to be the basis of information upon which the President proceeds. They are to be certified to the Secretary of the Interior. He then has got before him the statement of the chiefs. If there is any explanation made by a member of the tribe or by anybody else to show that injustice has been done, it is for him then to institute such inquiry as will result in eliminating persons from that roll who do not belong there. Without something of this kind where are you going to begin? You cannot take a census of an Indian tribe as you might take the census of an ordinary white family, because they roam about, they are not easily to be found. They are resentful about these things; they do not give information in regard to the members of their tribe or the members of their families, if they can avoid it. The taking of a census of an Indian tribe is the hardest thing in the world to do. The ascertainment of the fact through white sources of information or ordinary inquiry as to who belongs to a tribe, is something attended with a great deal of difficulty; but you can go to the chiefs and they can tell you at once who are the members of the tribe. Then having made out this roll, the roll is to be transmitted, if my amendment should be adopted, to the Secretary of the Interior, and is to be submitted to his inspection through the agencies he has at his command, in order to see whether or not it conforms to the truth.

If, as the Senator from Alabama suggests, any point may be made in regard to the adoption of persons hereafter who might receive this benefit, I am willing to modify the amendment I have offered. I think, perhaps, that is a valuable suggestion, because we are setting up here a landed aristocracy, and it may be that ambitious white men will be glad to become members of that aristocracy. Consequently it may be a good idea to limit the provision to people who have been adventurous enough to take upon themselves the burdens of Indian compact heretofore.

Mr. MORGAN. I hope the Senator from Kansas will modify his amendment so as to insert the words "heretofore adopted," or in some way to prevent persons from being admitted into a tribe hereafter, white persons particularly. Then it seems to me there can be no objection to the adoption of his amendment, because it furnishes evidence upon which the Government can make the registration and be assisted in making it.

Mr. BUTLER. I should like to ask my friend from Alabama if the bill now does not provide for the very point which he and the Senator from Kansas are attempting to reach? Does it not allow the President of the United States to ascertain who among the tribes are entitled to land in severalty? It seems to me so, and I cannot understand, as I have caught the spirit and purpose of the amendment, how it will facilitate the division in severalty which the Senators from Alabama and Kansas say they intend to accomplish. It seems to me it would be a great deal better to leave the President, under the general discretion the bill gives him, to make the allotment according to the information which he himself may procure in his own way.

Mr. COKE. The amendment of the Senator from Kansas would restrict the President to one method, while the bill as it now stands leaves him to every source of information.

Mr. MORGAN. No Senator has yet pointed out the provision of the bill which authorizes the President to ascertain who are members of the tribe. The argument made by the Senator from Texas is that it is to be inferred that the President will have the power to locate the tribe. However, my eye has not fallen on any provision yet which authorizes him to designate who are members of the tribe, but after they are designated, of course he can locate the tribe.

Mr. COKE. I will say to the Senator from Alabama that the authority of the President for the ascertainment of the individuals among the tribes is derived from the fact that it is made his duty to have the lands allotted in severalty to each individual Indian, which he cannot do without first finding out who they are.

Mr. MORGAN. I hope the Senator from Texas will not become excited about this business. It is a very business transaction, and it is not necessary to have any animated speech about it.

Mr. COKE. The Senator from Alabama need not give me advice on that point.

Mr. MORGAN. Of course it is no advice from me. I think, though, the Senator needs to take counsel of his own wisdom about this matter. I refer him to himself as the embodiment of wisdom, from which he can possibly derive no incorrect opinion in regard to his conduct, or mine either.

The President of the United States is to locate the Indians of a tribe upon certain tracts of land, and yet the bill does not point out any means by which the President is to ascertain who the tribe is by registration. You locate an Indian of one of the Sioux bands, of which there are a great number, upon a certain reservation. He has relationships, and tribal relationships, among the Arapahoes and the Cheyennes in the Indian Territory. After you have got him located there, without any registration being required to be made by law, what is to prevent that Indian from going off and making a location in another tribe? There is nothing in the bill to prevent it; there is no measure provided by which that can be prevented.

The object of the Senator from Kansas is merely to provide a machinery which will throw some restraint about the Indian in question by identifying him with his tribe, and then by registering him, so that after he receives his location he may be known of all men as an Indian who was located in that tribe. Certainly it is an improvement of this bill, and not in hostility to any feature or principle contained in it, that the Indians should be registered, that they should be registered by families, particularly when you allow lands to be allotted to the head of a family, and that they should thereby be designated. It is advantageous to all who may be concerned in the location and registration of an Indian to be able to derive information from the heads of families or from the heads of the tribe as to whether the Indian belongs to and is identified with that tribe or not. It is to prevent fraud, to prevent overreaching, to prevent uncertainty, that the Senator from Kansas offers these amendments, and not for the purpose, as I have repeatedly said, of attempting to obstruct the passage of this bill in any proper form.

Mr. BUTLER. It seems to me that the second and third sections are ample to accomplish the purpose for which the Senator from Alabama and the Senator from Kansas contend. The second section reads:

That all allotments set apart under the provisions of this act shall be selected by the Indians, heads of families selecting for their minor children, &c.

The third section provides:

That the allotments provided for in this act shall be made by special agents appointed by the President for this purpose.

It seems to me that it will be utterly impossible for the Senate to provide a more perfect machinery to carry out the provisions of this bill, than is provided in these two sections. My apprehension and difficulty in regard to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas would be that it provides that all persons who have been adopted by the several tribes shall be allowed lands in severalty. What would be easier than for 1,000, 10,000 or 20,000 white men to be adopted by any tribe and divide the lands, and get their share in severalty, thereby defeating the very object and purpose of the bill, as I contend? It seems to me it would be very unjust to the Indians. It would certainly not be in accordance with the intent and purpose of the bill as I understand it, which is that the Indians shall have their lands in severalty, and all that is over and above the allotment in severalty, they shall have the benefit of when it is sold.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas has modified his amendment. The modification will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is to add to the amendment as originally offered the following proviso:

Provided, That no white man who shall hereafter intermarry into any tribe, or be adopted therein, shall be entitled to any of the benefits of this act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas as modified by him, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 13, nays 31: as follows:

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to offer an amendment to the sixth section. I know that the bill is as perfect as human ingenuity can make it, as the committee have had their attention called to the whole subject; but here is a proposition that probably is an oversight, and I want it amended. It is provided in the sixth line of the sixth section "that their lands shall not be subject to taxation or execution upon the judgment, order, or decree of any court." That ought to be qualified so that they shall not be subject to taxation, judgment, &c., for a period of twenty-five years, because that will make it in harmony with the rest of the bill. Therefore I move to amend, by inserting after the word "court," in the eighth line of the sixth section, the words "for a period of twenty-five years after the issuing of patents thereto;" so as to read:

Provided, That their lands shall not be subject to taxation or execution upon the judgment, order, or decree of any court for a period of twenty-five years after the issuing of patents thereto.

I presume it is the intention of the committee to have it in that way, and as it is morally certain that this land will be the property of white men immediately after that time, I do not think there is any reason why it should be forever exempted from taxation. If in our anxiety to provide for the Indians we may do that, we should not let our anxiety go so far as to extend it to the white men who will become the owners thereafter.

Mr. COKE. I see no objection to that amendment.

Mr. INGALLS. The whole proviso in section 6 is a duplicate of the first proviso in section 5, which reads:

Provided, That the lands acquired by any Indian under and by virtue of this act shall not be subject to alienation, lease, or incumbrance, either by voluntary conveyance or by the judgment, order, or decree of any court, or subject to taxation of any character, but shall be and remain inalienable, and not subject to taxation, lien, or incumbrance for the period of twenty-five years from the date of the patent, which said restrictions shall be incorporated in the patents when issued.

I suggest to the chairman of the committee that the proviso in lines 6, 7, and 8 of section 6, down to and including the word "court," be stricken out from the bill, inasmuch as it is merely a repetition of what appears in section 5.

Mr. TELLER. If that is done, of course my amendment would not be required. If it is not done the amendment I suggested should prevail.

Mr. INGALLS. The proviso in section 6 is merely a repetition of the one that occurs in section 5. It is superfluous, and might be omitted properly from the bill.

Mr. COKE. I thought the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado would be agreed to without objection, and I did not object to it. I do not know that the proviso is superfluous entirely. If the Senator from Kansas insists that it is, and is clear——

Mr. INGALLS. I have examined both provisos, and one is a repetition of the other, a duplicate, and it ought not to appear in the bill; but if it is retained of course the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado should be incorporated. I suggest to simplify the bill, as what appears in one section is not necessary in another, that the second proviso be omitted.

Mr. COKE. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado can then withdraw his amendment, and the Senator from Kansas can move to strike out the proviso.

Mr. TELLER. I withdraw my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Colorado is withdrawn.

Mr. INGALLS. I move, then, that the proviso contained in section 6 down to and including the word "court," in line 8 of that section, be stricken out, in the following words:

That their lands shall not be subject to taxation or execution upon the judgment, order, or decree of any court.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the amendment of the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS.]

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. I offer the following amendment, to come in as a new section:

SEC. 10. That the Secretary of the Interior shall cause to be established at each Indian agency on the reservations included in the provisions of section 1 of this act a system of continuous registration of the members of each tribe by families, as the family is recognized in civilized society: Provided, That where the head of any family is a husband having more than one wife, such wives shall be registered in the order in which they were taken in marriage; and all such wives of the polygamic family shall inherit property as daughters; but after the first registration no man shall have registered more than one living wife; and all polygamic marriages contracted subsequent to the first registration shall be void for all the purposes of registration and inheritance under the provisions of this act.

Mr. CONKLING. May I ask the Senator from Alabama do these daughters-in-law, as they are to be, consist of all the wives except one? As I listened to the language, all the wives, one as much as the others, would become daughters-in-law.

Mr. MORGAN. The reason for that is that by the law of the Indian tribes all the wives of Indians stand to them on the same footing. No preference is given to one wife over the other.

Mr. CONKLING. Then all share and share alike and pro rata?

Mr. MORGAN. They all share and share alike. I should like to remark of the amendment that it has been prepared by a gentleman who has had very great experience in reference to the tribal relations of the Indians and the family relations of the Indians, and has made the subject a study for very many years and is thoroughly familiar therewith—Major Powell.

The bill makes provision for the location of each head of a family on a quarter-section of land. It makes further provision that on the death of an Indian his lands shall descend according to the law of the Territory or of the State where the lands are found. By the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] and accepted by the committee, this bill is extended to the Indian Territory, with the exception of the five civilized tribes. That leaves the law of inheritance which is to apply to the Indians in this state: In Alaska, where there is no law, there will be no inheritance; in Idaho, Wyoming, and other Territories where there is territorial law there will be inheritance according to the law of the Territory, whatever it may be; in Nebraska and Kansas there will be inheritance according to the laws of those States; and so in North Carolina, and so in New York, where there are Indians sustaining tribal relations. When we come to the Indian Territory, the only law of inheritance that can be made to apply under this bill as it is now will be the law of Indian inheritance, and it is at that point we shall find ourselves in contact with this difficulty: The Indians have neither law nor religion that tolerates the holding of land in severalty between themselves. It is a crime against the institutions and laws of the Indians on this continent that they shall hold lands in severalty. That has been the law of every Indian tribe, with the exception of the five civilized tribes, so far as my reading has extended, since we first found them upon this continent. It is a crime against their law to hold land in severalty or to undertake to do so; it is an offense against their religion. Lands are held as communal property, and they are held really as chattels or personal property by a system that has prevailed and which allows each Indian to occupy the particular land upon which he is resident. When you come to administer this system in the Indian Territory under the provisions of this bill as it now stands, a bill which it is supposed does not need amendment and cannot be amended, we shall find that there is no law of inheritance whatever for Indian lands in that Territory.

The bill then provides that the Indians residing in the States shall inherit according to the laws of the States; the Indians residing in organized Territories shall inherit under the laws of those Territories; the Indians residing in the Indian Territory shall not inherit at all because there are no laws of inheritance at all; and the Indians residing in Alaska shall not inherit because there is no law there at all. That is the position in which the inheritance part of this bill is.

Now, suppose that you undertake to transmit land by descent from the head of an Indian family who may be located on a quarter section under the provisions of this bill. It may be the father of the family or it may be the mother of the family, as in the case of an old Indian woman who had no child at all, but had certain domestics around her and who was held to be the head of a family within the meaning of the Creek treaty of 1832, declared so by the Supreme Court of the United States. You start now with the head of a family, the father, I will say, who is located upon a quarter-section of land, and you want to find out who are his heirs at law. That man under a law which we recognize, a law which we enforce, had a right to a number of wives, because we tolerate, respect, and enforce the laws of the Indian tribes as a means of governing them; and by the adoption of the system of tribal government, by the statutes of the United States, which adoption is contained in this bill, and which adoption is contained in every measure that we have ever yet enacted in reference to the disposal and government of an Indian tribe, we enact by law that that man has a right to two, three, four, or as many more wives as he can get together and sustain. He is dead, and you want to settle the question of inheritance, not merely between the wives but between the children of the various wives. Under our system of laws the children of the subsequent wives to the first would not inherit from that father at all, they could inherit only from the mother. Under the system of civilized institutions, as I understand, there would be no inheritance in that case except from the mother, because all the children under our system of laws would be illegitimate except the children of the first wife. Then they must trace their inheritance through the mother. Whom does she inherit through on the death of her husband? Not from him. There is no law of any civilized country, no law of any State or Territory by which under the provisions of this bill you can trace the descent of the land from the husband to his wife or even to his children.

Now, there should be and must be, in order that this bill shall have any operation for the benefit of the Indians, an establishment created by law which shall be known as the Indian family, through which the propositus of inheritance and inheritable blood may be found, so that the property may descend. It therefore becomes our duty to annex as a condition of this grant of one hundred and sixty acres to the Indian, that in order to ascertain who the family is to which this law of inheritance or descent may apply, all the members of each tribe shall be registered by families; and the only way to get rid of the difficulty of the plurality of wives is that which has been suggested in the amendment, to treat each of the wives alike, not one superior to the other, but each upon a footing of entire equality, and allow the descent to commence in that way.

But the amendment provides that after that has been done, after the patent shall have issued to the Indian, then he shall not be allowed to have more than one wife recognized by the laws of the United States. He must then adopt the monogamic relation, and drop his polygamy as a condition of the grant, and after that time an Indian who marries can have but one lawful wife, and of course that must be the wife that he first marries.

Is there not some necessity for the enactment of this additional section to this bill? Why, Mr. President, this honorable committee with its distinguished chairman will find itself laboring for the next ten years, I think, in trying to expound this bill after it has passed in reference to the law of descent, unless you commence by this act of Congress with a positive and lawful organization of the family and declare that descent and inheritance shall descend from that family down through the regular channels while time shall last. When you undertake to apply civilized institutions to the Indians in this country, including the laws of inheritance and of descent, you are necessarily compelled to establish by law the groundwork of the action by organizing the family into such relationship as is prescribed by law, and to declare that a family thus organized shall be a family known within the meaning of this statute.

I cannot get rid of the difficulty that is in the bill by the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. VEST,] because I cannot understand how it is possible that any law of descent or of inheritance can apply to a man in the Indian Territory when there is neither tradition nor law there for the purpose of carrying land from one Indian to another by descent; but I am now speaking in reference to the country outside of the Indian Territory, and am desirous to give the bill as much scope as it is possible to give it, and you will find yourselves beset with difficulties which have agitated the lawyers in certain portions of this country for twenty or thirty years unless you adopt a provision of this kind.

I remember perfectly well when I was a little boy to have seen an Indian woman who was wounded in one of the battles General Jackson fought against the Creek Indians. She had a grandson by adoption, whose mother was the daughter of that Indian woman by adoption. She claimed a head right; she claimed the right to be located on a half section of land, being the wife of a chief, under the treaty of 1832, and under a statute which contained a provision that gave to each head of a family a tract of land. The locating agent not regarding her as the head of a family refused to locate her there. A cabin was put up on the place by the man who bought the land from the Government of the United States which undertook to sell it. She brought suit for that tract of land. That case remained in the courts of the country for thirty years, coming twice to the Supreme Court of the United States before it was finally decided, and the only question in the case was whether that old Indian woman was the "head of a family" within the meaning of that treaty. I submit if it is not better, I submit if it is not indispensable that we should in the enactment of this law, start a system which is wise and just in itself, which shall operate on the foundation upon which descent and inheritance may take place in reference to these lands. Left to Indian laws and Indian traditions, there is no such thing as descent of lands or inheritance of them. The truth is that in most of the Indian tribes of the Northwest the male members of the family do not inherit to the father at all. The daughters and wives inherit to the father. Of course that rule applies to personal property, because they have not got anything but personal property. An Indian daughter or an Indian wife takes the property in preference to the male members of the family. They are supposed to be able with their implements of hunting and agriculture, or whatever else they possess, to sustain themselves. The Indian laws, therefore, all cut off the male members of the family entirely from the inheritance. We are compelled, then, if we establish the "head of a family" and take any measure at all in regard to the descent or inheritance of real estate, to commence by ordaining in this statute who shall be the head of a family and the degree of relationship in which the members of a family shall inherit one to the other. To get rid of the polygamous feature of Indian family society, we are compelled to place the wives of Indians as they now are upon the footing of daughters. Therefore it is that I offer the amendment.

Mr. COKE. Under the bill as reported the Indian Territory was excluded from its operation entirely, there being no general law of inheritance in the Indian Territory as there is in the States and organized Territories. Since the amendment of the Senator from Missouri has been adopted, which struck out the words "Indian Territory" and inserted instead the names of the five civilized tribes in that Territory, so as to exclude them specifically, there are other Indians in the Territory upon whom the bill will operate, who, as the bill now stands would be, as the Senator from Alabama says, without any law on the subject of alienation and inheritance. It is the purpose of the committee, in order to remedy this defect before the voting on the bill is closed, to offer an amendment which will make the law of one of the States contiguous to the Indian Territory—say the State of Kansas—the law in the Indian Territory. That is the purpose of the committee. When that is done, the only Indians in the United States who will not be under the law of some State or Territory—that is, of those who may accept the provisions of the bill—will be the Alaska Indians, and there is no law in Alaska for Indians or anybody else. If the bill should be passed in its present shape, the Indians in the Indian Territory would be in no worse condition than they are already, for those upon whom this bill may operate have no general law of inheritance now. But it is deemed best by the committee that the bill be amended by placing the laws of Kansas over such Indians in the Indian Territory as may accept the provisions of the bill.

Now, as to the question about the heads of families, raised by the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to make an inquiry of the Senator from Texas. If the legislation is to take the form suggested, and we are to en masse enact the laws of some particular State for these Indians, I should like to know beforehand what State it is. I want to look up the statutes before I say that they shall be applicable to the people of the Indian Territory, and I want to know whether the Senator can now name the State that he proposes to take his laws from?

Mr. COKE. I spoke of the committee. I had spoken to, perhaps, two or three members of the committee. We have taken no pro forma action on it. Those to whom I have talked on the subject suggested the laws of the State of Missouri or the laws of the State of Kansas; and if I have to draw the amendment I shall propose that the laws of the State of Kansas be made applicable to the Indians in the Indian Territory who may come under the operation of this bill, if it is enacted, so far as the alienation and inheritance of property are concerned.

With reference to the question of polygamy and the constitution of the Indian family, I can see no necessity for any amendment on that subject, for the simple reason that the laws of the States and Territories where the lands are situated and the Indians reside will settle and determine all such questions. I see no use in Congress legislating upon a subject which the laws of the States and Territories will take care of whenever real questions arise, and it will be remembered by the Senate that this bill, if enacted, does not ipso facto become a law to the Indians anywhere. It must be believed by the President of the United States, in the sound discretion vested in him, that it is desirable that it shall be executed upon certain Indians, and those Indians must desire the benefits of the law and express that desire to the authorities before the bill becomes operative upon anybody.

The difficulties seen by the Senator from Alabama do not appear to me. I believe the President is going to be practical in his construction of his duties and powers under this bill; I believe he will not consent that the law shall be placed over a tribe of Indians not prepared for it and where difficulties will be produced by its operation; and I believe that every question suggested by the Senator from Alabama will be met and solved by the laws of the States and Territories where the Indians and the lands are. I do not wish to see the bill encumbered with anything of this sort. This is a general bill, simply outlining a general policy, leaving to the laws of the States and Territories where the Indians are a great deal to do. If we attempted to exhaust the subject here we should have very much more to do than to consider the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama.

We are simply trying to prepare the Indian for citizenship, not forcing him to take lands in severalty, not requiring by an iron rule that this law shall be placed on every tribe of Indians, whether it is applicable or not; we are simply vesting in the President of the United States a sound discretion to do the things provided for in this bill when, in his judgment, it is wise to do them, and when the Indians are civilized enough to desire them done. That is all. We do not believe that the President is going to enforce this bill if it becomes a law in a way to operate harshly upon the Indians, or raise questions that are insolvable either by Congress or by the courts of the States and Territories. We believe that the President will be discreet, that he will understand the purpose of the bill, which is to do the best we can toward preparing these Indians for the duties of citizenship, and that he, too, will do the best he can, seconding the efforts of Congress, to relieve the Government of the burden of their support at as early a day as possible by making them self-supporting, by placing them on the highway to the result which all of us desire to see accomplished in advancing the Indians toward civilization, the acquisition of property, self-reliance, and self-support.

Sir, the difficulties pointed out in this bill by gentlemen who oppose it are innumerable, but I can see none of them. If it is an unwise bill the President will not execute it; he will not enforce it. If it brings hardship to the Indians they will not accept it, and their consent is necessary. The President must believe that the bill will advance the interests of the Indians, and the Indians must consent before there will be anything done. The President must believe that the laws of the States and Territories where the Indians are who propose to accept this bill are ample for their protection, and that the laws of alienation and descent, and all other laws, are such as the Indians can live under and ought to live under. All these things must concur, and when they do all will admit it is best for both the Government and Indians that the allotment should be made as the bill provides.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I regret very much to differ with the Senator from Texas in regard to the bill. He surely ought to understand it better than I do, but he either misunderstands its purport or I do. Now, the Senator from Texas says that whenever the President executes this law it is to be submitted to the particular tribe to be affected for their ratification, and whenever he thinks that the laws of descent of any State or Territory will be proper for the Indians the President will submit this act for the ratification of the Indians, but that the Indian cannot be compelled to ratify it, but they will do it willingly. The Senator says the Indians will never ratify the act by the concurrence of two-thirds of the male members as long as they see the difficulties in the way which I suppose will be encountered in proceeding to put it into execution. Now, to the first proposition let us see what the ill says, for I have no doubt at all of the good intentions of the Senator from Texas and of the committee; but I must take the bill by its language and not by any intent that may be locked up in the mind or heart of Senators. Here is the language of the bill on which the President puts his proposition before the Indian tribe:

> The President be, and he hereby is, authorized, whenever in his opinion any reservation of such Indians is advantageous for agricultural purposes, to cause said reservation to be surveyed or resurveyed, if necessary—and to locate the Indians by heads of families and individuals upon that reservation.

Mr. COKE. Will the Senator read the ninth section?

Mr. MORGAN. The ninth section is that the law shall not have any operation and effect at all until the Indians act; and taking the Senator on his own understanding of his own bill, he said awhile ago distinctly that this bill authorized the President, whenever he thought it was to the advantage of the Indian tribe, in reference to the capacity of that Indian tribe to seek civilization, to execute this law by tendering it to the Indians for their ratification. The language of this bill is not that. It is that "he is hereby authorized whenever in his opinion any reservation of such Indians is advantageous for agricultural purposes." The President in the enforcement of this law looks at the condition of the land, and not at the condition of the Indian. If the reservation upon which the Indians are located contains agricultural land, then the President is bound to put the proposition before the Indians if he is of that opinion, but it says not one word about their condition in reference to civilization, their education, their religion, their progress in social institutions. It all depends entirely on the value of the lands, and whether they are adapted to agricultural purposes; and yet the Senator from Texas understands so little about his own bill that he gets up and gravely informs the Senate of the United States that the condition on which the President is to put this law in operation is the condition of the Indians and not the condition of the land.

Mr. COKE. The Senator from Alabama will allow me to suggest that the matter is by the bill left entirely to the discretion of the President and the consent of the Indians.

Mr. MORGAN. Then I am incapable of understanding that part of the bill, and I think every Senator on the floor is bound to agree with me that there is but one condition-precedent in this bill, and that is not the situation or condition of the Indian tribes but the condition of the land in reference to its advantages for agricultural purposes, and that only.

The Senator proceeds further and says that the President is also to judge before he tenders this law to the Indians for ratification whether the laws of inheritance of the respective States and Territories, where this land may be found, are suitable to the Indian tribal or family organization. I do not find any such privilege or condition as that in this bill in reference to the President, and it is the first time that the idea ever occurred to me, and it seems to me that it is entirely a distortion of the purposes of this bill to assume that it has any such meaning in it. Let any Senator point out the language which makes it one of the conditions upon which a tribe is to be tendered the opportunity of ratifying or disaffirming this law that he shall be satisfied with the laws of inheritance and descent of the particular State or Territory in which the Indian is found.

Mr. COKE. The Senator will allow me to say that I have given a construction to the language of the bill which I believe it is fairly susceptible of.

Mr. MORGAN. But the Senator puts upon the language embodied in this bill a construction which is a matter of legal impossibility. He says the President shall determine whether, in his opinion, the laws of descent of the particular Territory or State are equal to the protection of the Indian family before he shall submit this law for ratification to the Indian tribes. I have found no langnage in the bill that hinted at such a power as that.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator will allow me a moment. May I ask him why Territories cannot regulate this matter of descent after we turn over the Indians to their laws?

Mr. MORGAN. For the reason that you convey a fee to the head of a family, and you subject him by the bill itself whenever he receives a patent for his land to the laws of the particular State or Territory in which he may be found. That is what the bill accomplishes; and it is too late, after we have yielded up the whole subject by transferring this man to the jurisdiction of the States and Territories in reference to the laws of inheritance and every other law, then to commence congressional action for the purpose of reversing that which you have done. What I complain of about the bill is that we are hurrying into a system that is ill-digested, that is not understood, and that cannot be explained, for various efforts have been made on this floor to explain it, and no Senator has succeeded yet in making a reasonable explanation.

The Senator proposes, he says, by an amendment which he has not offered yet, to pick up some State around there, the State of Texas, or Arkansas, or Missouri, or Kansas, and provide that the laws of inheritance and descent in one or the other of these States as he may select shall become the law of inheritance and descent for Indians within the Indian Territory. There is a body of land, a great deal of it, very fertile, larger than some of the largest States of this Union, about as large as three or four very respectable States in point of area. Now let us see what condition we have got ourselves into as to that Territory when such an amendment is adopted. I will take the laws of Kansas and I will ask the attention of the honorable Senators from Kansas while I ask them a question. Is there any law in the State of Kansas which provides for the disposal by descent or inheritance of land in favor of the wives of a man who has more than one wife?

Mr. INGALLS. If the Senator asks me that question, I will state that I do not know an instance in the State of Kansas of a man that has more than one wife.

Mr. MORGAN. I believe the State of Kansas is living up to all its other privileges.

Mr. INGALLS. The intention of her citizens is to avail themselves of all their privileges as far as they know them; but to answer the Senator seriously, there is no law on that subject that I am aware of in Kansas.

Mr. MORGAN. Nor is there any law in Missouri, or Arkansas, or in Texas to that effect. Then when the Senator from Texas selects a State which he intends to make the State whose laws shall regulate the inheritance of this Indian land in the Indian Territory, we have a large body of Indians there, numbering, I believe, some sixteen or eighteen thousand, many of whose men have two, three, four, or five wives. You go to the Indian with your proposition.

Mr. COKE. The bill as it is now may possibly not cover the Indian Territory in that regard, and does not provide as to Alaska; and so they would have exactly the same law as they have now.

Mr. MORGAN. What is the law of inheritance in the Territory of Washington? I cannot recite the particular law; I do not know that they have got any; but all they have is subject to be repealed by an act of Congress in that Territory or in any other organized Territory of the Union. The necessary effect of this bill will be this, if it is passed in the form in which it has come from the committee: when you locate a man as the head of a family on a quarter-section of land which may be within the borders of a State, whether it is New York, North Carolina, Nebraska, Kansas, or wherever else it may be, and that man dies, his family relation is totally dissolved by the law of that State as an illegitimate union; his children are deprived of all inheritance of blood, except perhaps the children of the one marriage, and you destroy the family relation in your attempt. It shows the impracticability of undertaking to thrust upon the Indian by an act of Congress civilization in a wholesale way.

The committee understand now the difficulty which appears in reference to the Indian Territory, but they seem to have been so dead in love with their bill that they would not look at anything that criticised it in the slightest degree. The honorable Senator from Texas consented to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri not knowing at the time, not thinking at the time that the bill could have a possible imperfection, even when pointed out by the honorable Senator from Missouri; but it has a great many.

The Senator from Texas speaks about the ninth section of the bill, a clause which I shall move to strike out, and why? Upon great constitutional grounds as well as upon plain grounds of public policy. What is the ninth section?

SEC. 9. That the provisions of this act shall not extend to any tribe of Indians until the consent of two-thirds of the male members twenty-one years of age shall be first had and obtained.

We solemnly enacted this into a law governing the policy of the United States in reference to Indian tribes. At the moment that this law is enacted we find Indians in States and in Territories also, and in unorganized territory, in the possession of land. These lands are held by them under treaty stipulation and also under acts of Congress ratifying and confirming treaties. Who can take the title away from them? Nobody but Congress. Do you take it away by this bill? Certainly you do not until they ratify the act. What else do you do in reference to it? You confirm them in their title until two-thirds of the Indians shall consent to give it up. I do not believe there is a lawyer in the United States who upon a careful examination and consideration of this bill would differ with me upon that proposition in connection with it. Here is a grant of land made by act of Congress and by treaty to the Indians and they hold and occupy it until Congress shall otherwise direct, and Congress comes in and says that it will not otherwise direct until two-thirds of the male members of each tribe shall consent that it shall otherwise direct. Putting these enactments together and considering them in pari materia, it seems to me to be impossible to hold otherwise than that this is a proclamation of a grant to the Indians in perpetuity until such time as two-thirds of the male members of each Indian tribe entitled to a reservation shall give their consent to give it up.

There is another thing about this. Congress some years ago undertook a complete revolution in its policy of regarding the Indians as tribes with whom treaties could be made. There was a solemn enactment passed by the Congress of the United States that hereafter no Indian tribe should be considered in any sense such a tribe, or such a nation, or such a State that we could entertain treaty relations with that tribe. This was a revolution of the policy that had been pursued in this Government from its foundation, for I think the honorable Senator from Kansas said the other day there were more than five hundred treaties now standing, more or less, in force that we had made with them since the organization of this Government.

Having abandoned entirely the treaty-making power, what else do we do? We proceed not by negotiating with the headmen of the tribe, but with two-thirds of the men twenty-one years of age and upward, recognizing their tribal relation, recognizing their tribal rights in this very bill. There is here no dissolution of the tribal relation; there is here no control of it. There is here a most emphatic and a most explicit recognition of it. While we no longer treat with the headmen of the tribes under the treaty-making power, to be ratified and confirmed by the Senate, we enact laws in the nature of contracts to be made with a majority or two-thirds of the men twenty-one years of age and upward, and these laws are to have effect on the Indians until this majority vote and say they shall not have effect. If there ever was the elevation of a race of people into a condition where they could make treaties with you, it is in the very body of this bill, and it is an entire reversal of the policy that we fixed when we said to the country, "Hereafter we will make no treaties with Indian tribes."

What is a contract with an Indian tribe? Is it anything else than a treaty? Unless you get every member of the tribe to sign it, it is no contract at all in the ordinary sense of the word, because there are parties to it who are not bound to it by their voluntary assent. A contract is an agreement entered into between two or more consenting minds upon a consideration. You have got here an agreement made with a tribe of Indians represented by men who are twenty-one years of age and upward; the women are not represented at all; and yet they are the owners of a large part of the Indian property. The widows who may be heads of families are not represented; the boys or young men under twenty-one years of age are not represented; and yet these young men constitute, as we know, in Indian government a most important part of the whole tribe. They have more to do with the control of Indian government than any other branch of any tribe. These are not consulted; the children are not consulted. One-third of the men may vote against it, and if they are voted down two-thirds of the male members of the tribe twenty-one years of age and upward can take the property of the rest of the tribe and dispose of it absolutely, and they can give their consent or withhold their assent to the power of the Government of the United States to enact laws to bear upon them.

Mr. COKE. Will the Senator yield to a question?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. COKE. Is not the title to Indian land now in the Indians in the political community or tribe?

Mr. MORGAN. No, sir.

Mr. COKE. Then it is in the individuals.

Mr. MORGAN. Not at all. If it is I have read the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in vain. There is but one case in which it has ever been so held, and that was the case of a treaty which expressly said that the fee-simple was conveyed by the Government of the United States to the Indian tribe. I refer to a case in 17 Wallace. In the Cherokee case that point was raised in the Supreme Court of the United States. Because the treaty stipulation contained a provision that the Indian should have a patent to the land it was held that the fee-simple had been conveyed by the Government; but where you merely locate an Indian tribe upon a reservation and do not in the treaty or by an act of Congress make them a grant of the allodium or fee-simple to the land their title is only a title of occupancy; and the Government of the United States not only has the right to move them, but there is a law standing on the statute-book, which the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs certainly ought to know, that where an Indian tribe located upon a tract of land as a reservation, it makes no difference by what solemnity of treaty engagement, engages in hostilities against the Government of the United States, the President, without more, without the action of Congress or of the judiciary, has a right to dissolve the tribal relation and remove the Indians from it. No, sir; there never was a greater mistake than that suggested by that honorable Senator that the title to these lands belongs to the Indians of this country.

Mr. COKE. I have referred to the fact that under the decisions of the Supreme Court the title to Indian lands is vested not in the individuals but in the political community designated by the name of tribe, and that the individuals have no more right to the land and no more title to any portion of that land than a citizen of the United States has to any portion of the public lands.

Mr. MORGAN. The title to an Indian reservation, whatever it is, is invested in the tribe and not in the individual; but the next question arises, what is that title? Unless the Government of the United States has relinquished to the Indian tribe the title in fee it is only a title of occupancy. That is the sort of title it is, and all reservations (unless perhaps the reservation in favor of the five civilized tribes) granted to them by treaty or by an executive order, are held by the Indians not as owners of the fee-simple but they are held by the Indians by a title of occupancy which we can reverse at any minute in the world. It is only a question of morality, a question of good faith on our part, whether we will remove them or not. Here stands a law on the statute-book which declares that whenever they commit hostilities as a tribe against the United States of America the President shall dissolve the tribal relation and remove them off the lands and take from them all the benefits, annuities, and everything else.

Now, it is proposed to take men who are in this attitude under our laws, and whom we are trying to civilize, and to erect them into tribal communities of that degree of power and dignity so as to enable them to check the power of the Government of the United States, until two-thirds of the male members twenty-one years of age of each tribe shall consent to the enactment of our laws. Why, sir, here are laws on the statute-book that relate to the Indian in every possible phase, form, and condition in which he can be found—criminal laws; laws disposing of property and life; laws which take property out of his hands and put it into the hands of an agent for sale; laws sequestering certain species of property for sale, and putting the proceeds of it in the Treasury of the United States; laws that reach every Indian in the nation, and hold him more a slave than a man, a thousand times. Look over the statute-book of the United States, and for years and years we have been enacting them, and never did we think it was necessary to get the consent of an Indian tribe that these laws should go into effect. But now it seems to be necessary to get their consent that this law shall go into effect. Why so? It is because the grasping hand of power, which like a good many other things has not been seen by the Senator from Texas—for he says there is not a thing I see that he can see—it is the grasping hand of power which undertakes to say that an Indian hereby shall be brought in contact with the law, so that by some slippery operation their lands may be secured. It may be that the Indians will consent to its going into effect, and say what lands they will receive or what lands they decline to receive, and then the unallotted portion of their land is to be sold; or if a whole tribe refuse to accept the allotment, and yet consented to the enactment of the law, what becomes of the land? It may all in that way get into the hands of one man in this country, so that he may have the power not merely to control the Indians, but the power to control the movements of population throughout the West.

Senators may not see it. I do not expect from what I say to induce them even to look at it, but the time will come when they will see it. The time will come when they will find that they have lent themselves to the most pernicious system that was ever invented in the land.

No, sir; if we expect to move in the government of the Indian, let us move like a Congress and not like suppliants at the wigwams of these different bands for consent to govern them. When the Indian understands that you intend to govern him and provide proper rules for his action, which he must observe, then you have made an advance toward his civilization which is worth all the powder and shot you have thrown away on him for one hundred years. When you legislate for him, legislate for him, and let him understand that, like myself and every other man in this country, he must bow to the constitutional authority of the law-making power. The moment he gets to understand it, he is a half-civilized man. There are more than five hundred different tribes in the United States, each with a different law. You organize your government of agents and commissioners; you draw upon the Treasury year after year for money to supply them with traveling expenses and salaries and outfits; you go to the camp of the Indians congregated on the bank of a river or a creek or a plain somewhere; you submit this act of Congress; you undertake to explain to the Indians that which the Senators themselves do not understand—the true construction of the law. You want to induce them to accept it. You want to get two-thirds of the Indian men of the particular tribe to accept a law before it can become an enactment. How long will it take to carry such a law into effect in this country?

You send out agents for the purpose of getting the consent of the Indians, and then you will have cases coming back upon you like the case of the Ponca Indians, where the Secretary of the Interior has to come out before the world and acknowledge that the Indians were deceived. They rightfully held lands under a treaty, but they were taken from the Niobrara and carried down to the Indian Territory, and the excuse that is made for it is that the agents who were sent there to negotiate with the Indians came back and reported that they had got the consent of the tribe to go; and, Mr. President, a broader and a deeper falsehood than that was never uttered by mortal man. But these slippery fellows, who wanted to make money out of the Indians, came back and reported that they had got their consent, and then they were hauled as captives, first the chiefs, and then the tribe, down to that Territory, and there they were imprisoned, and there they are imprisoned to this day, and the Secretary of the Interior has been apologizing as well as he could to the country for it from that day to this.

So in regard to all these other tribes or many of them; the same story will be repeated. The Indians, some few drunken fellows or some men bribed with beads or tobacco or knives, will say: "Why, we are ready to treat with our Great Father," or our great grandfather, or our great grandmother, or somebody else who is great and grand—"we are ready to treat with you." Then they and the agents sit down and talk; the presents are brought to the Indians; their pockets are filled with a little douceur; and then they are ready to treat. Treat about what? Whether this law shall become a law or not. Enacted by Congress, approved by the President, it is no law until the Congress of the United States has invited the Indian chiefs to become parties and two-thirds of them say it shall be a law. There is not one particle of the enactment in all the system of law brought you by this committee that can become a law until two-thirds of the Indians have consented to and ratified it.

Sir, if you progress in that way toward the control of Indians by the authority of written laws, you will be a century making the slightest impression upon them. Those men of the Indian tribes who are conservative and who are looking to the interest and welfare of their families, will say this to you: "True you present this law to me to be ratified; can you remove us from off this territory?" "No; the law itself says we cannot do it." While this law is not operative on a particular tribe of Indians, it becomes a law nevertheless, and a law which controls one class of Indians absolutely and without their consent.

Turn to the fourth section of this bill. There it provides for Indians not residing on reservations, and gives them the right to select land in any State or Territory of the American Union whether the lands there are surveyed or unsurveyed. If you will look at that fourth section of the bill you will see that the law will govern Indians who do not belong now to particular tribes, and they are provided for with homesteads and the right of entry on lands with no charge for office fees or anything of the sort, to a degree that rises far above the privileges of any white man in the United States. There is no condition about that section. If it is enacted it becomes a law to these Indians, and all the lands that are provided for in the fourth section are given away to these Indians upon the terms and conditions therein mentioned. And I invite Senators to turn to that fourth section of the bill and see how far this bill becomes operative even without the consent of two-thirds of the tribe where they are not on reservations, and then they will see something about the harmony of the bill; then they will understand the principle of the bill which will not admit of the slightest criticism here without giving offense to Senators.

Now, Mr. President, though I get no credit from some quarters for the candor of my statements, I want to make provision of law by which the Indian shall receive land in severalty, believing that that is the best means of giving him a start toward civilization, and knowing as well as the Indians now know that through that means and that agency alone are they to be expected to take a start to retrieve themselves from the unfavorable position in which they are found to-day. Knowing that they have no other resource left; knowing that they are surrounded on every side by powerful communities; seeing the light of civilization and its dazzling examples glittering before their eyes continually, they may be induced and will be induced by thousands and tens of thousands, as I hope in a short period of time, to accept so much of civilization as shall relate to the culture of the soil, the raising of stock, and other descriptions of useful property; and that is the starting-point in the civilization of every man. It is to teach him to support himself by the labor of his own hands and by the skill he possesses, whatever it may be, to maintain himself and his family. But if you leave it to the headmen and chiefs and influential men of the Indian tribes to say when they will accept a system that dissolves their family relations, that bastardizes their children, that destroys their hope and power of inheritance, that makes them citizens of each State where they may be found in reference to all the duties and obligations and burdens of citizenship without conferring upon them the rights of citizenship there, and which at the same time, under the amendment which has been voted down in this bill, denies them the rights of citizens of the United States—when you bring this measure before these Indians and tell them that they can accept that or else live on their reservations with their lands in common as their religion teaches them to do and as their experience of hundreds of years has taught them to do, you will not get a two-thirds majority to adopt your bill; and then all this structure will fall to the ground, not because it is not right, not because it has not engaged the attention and the votes of the Senate and House of Representatives and the approval of the President of the United States, but because merely ninety Indian men out of a tribe refuse to let it become a law.

Sir, your progress in government, if these are the steps you are taking, will be a progress that will realize nothing but disaster in time to come. This bill cannot be executed, and the honorable Senator from Texas to-day apologizes for it before the Senate by saying that if the bill did not go into effect it would not do any harm, or words to that effect, and it would be a harmless measure. Have we been engaged here for a week in the debate of a measure that is to be harmless, that the President can enforce or not enforce, as he pleases? What does the Senator from Texas mean the Senate to do for the public welfare, to organize itself into a mere debating society, and conclude with a resolution that is of no more effect than the resolution of a debating society? We pass a bill on the recommendation of a committee that may never become a law, and therefore cannot do any harm!

Only last year that celebrated Ute bill was passed which has a provision for a two-thirds ratification; and the honorable Senator from Colorado, [Mr. TELLER,] the day this debate opened, virtually called for the report of the Ute commission, a commission that has been in operation now for nearly a year in the Ute Indian territory for the purpose of getting the Ute Indians to ratify a law that contained the same provision as to its ratification.

Mr. COKE. I have had an interview with the Secretary of the Interior on the floor of the Senate Chamber, and he has authorized me to say that there is nothing in the reports or correspondence of the Ute commission which would have the slightest weight whatever against this bill.

Mr. MORGAN. Yesterday evening the honorable Senator from Colorado introduced a resolution, and the Senate adopted it, requiring the Secretary of the Interior to lay that information before this body.

Mr. COKE. He will do it.

Mr. MORGAN. But he has not done it, nor will he ever do it until the debate on this bill is over. The Ponca commission that went down to investigate the condition of Ponca affairs has not yet reported, and will never report while an argument can be drawn from their action and transactions against this pet policy of the Secretary of the Interior. A man who does not know as much about Indians as the honorable Senator from Kansas, a man who was raised in a country that does not know what an Indian is, after a brief experience of one presidential term, and after having committed a blunder if not a crime in the case of the Ponca Indians, for which he has been apologizing and excusing himself from that day to this, withholds the information due to the Senate, and comes and communicates to the chairman of the Senate committee that in the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior everything is all right in the Ute bill and its execution. I do not believe that the statements of the honorable Secretary will be justified by the evidence in that case when it comes to be examined by a committee of the Senate.

Mr. COKE. The papers will be sent to the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not want to vote on this bill until I see that report and get that information.

Mr. EATON. You never will.

Mr. MORGAN. I am afraid not. I am afraid I shall not live long enough to see it. But, sir, that was a small dose of the immense bolus of physic that is now being administered to this country; that only related to the Ute Indians and the State of Colorado, and they then said that was the one measure which was necessary to prevent war and to enable the Indians to get land in the country. They have tried that policy. This bill has been put to a severe test by this arrangement. Now we are asked to swallow the whole affair and make this law universally applicable to every Indian in the United States, even in Alaska and the Indian Territory, while the Secretary of the Interior does not deign to inform us, though the resolution of the Senate has been passed, what he has done under that bill, how much it has cost, what Indian has been located under it. I would ask the honorable Senator from Colorado, for it is in his country, if he has heard that any Indian of the Ute tribe has ever yet been located under the bill we passed last year?

Mr. TELLER. I would say that none have received allotments. I said the other day the prospect was no better for their location now than it was when we passed the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. The preliminary provisions of the treaty have not been complied with yet. It is impossible for any location to be made.

Mr. TELLER. Why not?

Mr. MORGAN. Does the Senator from Iowa call it a treaty?

Mr. ALLISON. To gratify my friend I will call it an agreement.

Mr. MORGAN. I supposed the honorable Senator was consulting his own convictions about it. He calls that a treaty which is an act of Congress, which would become a bargain when agreed to by the Indians.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa what preliminaries he refers to? The treaty has been signed; the money has been paid; I do not know what more is to be done. The Indians are still there, and if they are ever moved it will take the Army to move them.

Mr. MORGAN. The Indians are to have their land after they are removed.

Mr. HILL, of Colorado. If the Senator from Alabama will allow me one moment, I should like to make a remark on that point. I have stated on this floor, in explanation of the reasons why the land has not been allotted to the Ute Indians in severalty, that before those provisions of the treaty could be carried out which were required in advance of the allotment of the land winter had set in. I have stated that the commission who were to go out and take a census of the Indians and provide for the payment of the money did not reach there until August or September. The delay was caused by the opposition to the passage of the bill. It should have passed last February, but it did not get through until the 15th of June. That alone accounts for the failure to remove the Indians thus far.

No one knows better than my colleague that it would be impossible to move these Indians in the heart of winter. Surveyors cannot go out to select lands and survey them with four or five feet of snow on the ground. It was the lateness of the passage of the bill that prevented the land from being allotted to the Indians, as was contemplated, last summer.

Mr. MORGAN. I will ask the Senator from Colorado what time did they get the treaty to the Indians for their signatures?

Mr. HILL, of Colorado. I do not know the exact date; but I should think it was not earlier than October.

Mr. MORGAN. If it took from June to October to get one tribe of Indians to consent to an enactment of this character, how long will it take to get five hundred to consent?

Mr. HILL, of Colorado. I wish to say further, in answer to the Senator from Alabama, that when the census had been taken and when the Indians had signed the agreement—not two-thirds, as he stated, but three-fourths had signed the agreement—then a certain amount of money was to be paid them. That was provided for in the agreement, and it took time to get the money there; and I assert that it was on account of the time required to carry out these provisions of the Ute bill that no lands have been allotted.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator from Alabama will yield to me a moment, I think I understand something about this Ute business. On the 15th of June we passed the bill and it was approved by the President. There was no reason why the commission should not have been upon the ground in ten days, and if the Indians were prepared to do what it was asserted here again and again upon this floor by authority of the Secretary they were prepared to do, the treaty ought to have been signed in fifteen days more.

Mr. President, the money that was sent there to be paid to those Indians was their money and had been due them and unjustly withheld by the Secretary of the Interior for more than four years. It was their money that he sent there to be paid. It was not our money. It had been due and had lain in the Treasury ready to be paid whenever he made an order to pay it, and he ought to have sent with that commission this money to have been paid to the Indians.

And, Mr. President, after the treaty was signed by these Indians—and it was not in October; my colleague is mistaken; it was earlier than that that this treaty was signed—after the treaty was signed and before the money was paid, the commission must go to the city of Denver and remain there for some considerable time waiting for this money to come out to be paid to the Indians. Now, Mr. President, they have succeeded in getting the agreement signed. I believe an investigation will show that it was signed under peculiar, not to say not very creditable circumstances, and I have not the slightest doubt that time will demonstrate the correctness of my supposition on that point.

The commission that was sent have never yet located an Indian upon the land that they were to go out and look upon, with the exception of the land on the La Plata, and they do not know to-day, except as they get it from hearsay, whether it is a suitable place to put the Indians or not. No order has been made for survey; no effort has been made for survey. When the money was appropriated we were told that they were to go there immediately and that the whole thing was to be settled.

I said that they had not brought peace to Colorado, and I say here now, and the whole people of the State will sustain me, and every officer of the Government who is honest and whose attention has been called to it will sustain me, that but for the presence of United States troops after the treaty was signed there would have been open and flagrant war between the white people of that State and the Indians, and not begun by the white people either. My colleague knows that fact, everybody knows it in the State, that but for the troops that were at Los Pinos and the troops that were at Fort Lewis and the troops at Fort Garland there would have been open war after the treaty had been signed by three-quarters of these Indians.

I said the other day, and I repeat here again, that there never was such a farce on the face of the earth as there is in procuring the signature of a common Indian to a treaty. He has not the slightest knowledge of it. In 1877 we sent out a commission to Colorado to treat with them, and the commission went there with the instruction from the Secretary to pay them the money that was due them, provided they would agree to sign the treaty, and if they would not agree to sign that treaty, to withhold and keep the money and return it to the United States Treasury—money that was due them by the solemn obligation of this Government. This was one of the great troubles we had with the Ute Indians, that the Secretary of the Interior (who now assumes to be the champion of the Indians, and whose friends are ready to decry any man as the foe of the Indian who does not sympathize with him in his sentiments upon this question) withheld their money; and it was that same Secretary who said to his commission, "Pay this, provided they sign the treaty; and if they do not, you return with their money in your pockets, and you put it back into the Treasury."

Mr. President, no man can say honestly whether this treaty will be a good treaty or not; but certainly nothing has happened, nothing has occurred, nothing has come out of it that will justify any man in saying on this floor or anywhere else that it is a success or that it promises to be a success. If it promises anything it promises to bring on the Indian greater troubles and on the whites greater troubles than we have had heretofore. That is what I am satisfied will be the result of that treaty and nothing else.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, whatever else has taken place in reference to the execution of the Ute treaty, this one fact must be admitted, that if the purpose of that treaty was to locate Indians in severalty on the public lands, no part of that purpose has yet been accomplished. I think we should have had all the information which can be derived from the action of the Government in its effort to locate Indians under that bill upon the public land for the purpose of being the better able to understand what will come of this measure after we have enacted it. That is my complaint against the action of the Government in reference to the information that ought to have been sent to us from the Ute country.

The honorable Senator from Colorado says the Indians are there yet and he very much apprehends that they will remain there until they are removed by force. Then what becomes of the proposition that the Indians have ratified this treaty in order to get upon agricultural lands? I suppose it is extremely doubtful, extremely debatable whether the lands to which they are to be carried are equal to those from which they are being carried in respect of the advantages of agricultural location. But if the Indians have signed that treaty as it is called, or that contract, it is not in reference to the obtaining of land in severalty at any location for themselves, but it has evidently been with reference to obtaining the ready money that was to be paid to them for that consideration. I remember distinctly well that in that bill we were to pay Ouray a thousand dollars a year as salary—the chief of an Indian tribe paid by the Government of the United States a thousand dollars a year salary—for what? For nothing else than to get his influence to persuade the Indians to sign that contract. That is part of the farce the honorable Senator from Colorado speaks of, and very justly, too, in reference to getting the Indians of any tribe to sign a contract with the Government under an act of Congress. There are not many Indians in the United States who can understand a contract when submitted to them, who can understand all the provisions of this enactment of Congress, and certainly very few if any of them will be able to understand for a long time to come the legal effect of the provisions relating to the family and relating also to the descent of the title to this land upon their posterity after they are dead. Whatever Indians may be obtained to consent to an enactment of this kind will be influenced by such measures as the Government can bring to bear on them to control them in their action, and I fear very much that they will not be influenced by a desire to hold their lands in severalty. That is what I desire to accomplish under the bill, to have the Indians make this start toward civilization by getting homesteads in severalty, and I do not think it is wise to put it in the power of two-thirds of a tribe of Indians to say to one-third "you shall not have your land in severalty."

Now let me ask, Mr. President, how you are going to locate an Indian on one of these reservations on land in severalty under this bill until two-thirds of the Indians of that tribe shall have consented that the bill shall become a law? It is about true that not more than one-third of the male members of any Indian tribe in the West are ready to-day or will be ready in five years from to-day to take land in severalty and go into the business of agriculture, go to hard work and labor. I think that we may very well count upon that fact. Suppose, however, there may be just a little less than a third that desire to do it, you have passed this law in Congress, you take it to the tribe and submit it to them, and they say "for certain considerations influencing us we will not consent that this law shall become operative on our tribe;" then the two-thirds who do not desire to engage in agricultural pursuits have the absolute power to shut out these men from taking land in severalty under this bill.

It seems to me that the ninth section of the bill is not worth anything at all. Strike it out, and let us legislate for these Indians as we would for anybody else under the control and jurisdiction of Congress by making laws for them that are wise and beneficial, and then compel them to accept them, and go on compelling them to obey them whether they accept them or not. There is nothing harsh in that, nothing cruel in that, nothing that is going to offend an Indian even, because they acknowledge now the supremacy of the Government of the United States, and they are not going to be offended with us if we in a wise, just, and prudent way exercise our power in their control.

I think that the honorable committee will do well to abandon that view of the case, to allow the Indians to become subject to the laws of the United States as everybody else is, for the proposition I state cannot be denied, that if we have the power to pass this law and put it into force by consent of two-thirds of the Indians of a particular tribe, you have the right to put it in force without the consent of two-thirds. I do not see how that proposition is to be answered as a matter of power and jurisdiction. If we have power to pass this bill at all we have the power to pass it, although we may not get the consent of a single Indian in the Territory, and the bill itself by conferring this power upon two-thirds of the Indians to nullify, to abrogate, or to refuse to allow this law to be put into operation, concedes the principle that Congress has the jurisdiction to legislate as it sees proper on this subject. I do not think there is any doubt about our power to do it, and I believe we shall subject ourselves to continual harassment and be continually disappointed in our hopes if we pass a law conditioned that it shall become a law only with the approval of the Indians.

But, Mr. President, the amendment that is under discussion relates to a different subject. The amendment will have to be adopted, it seems to me; before we can start a law of inheritance from the Indians at all we must annex a condition of that kind to the grant and put them in the line of civilization in reference to the descent of their property, and to do it we are compelled to reverse all the Indian traditions and tribal relations that exist between them in reference to the power and influence of the family.

Mr. HILL, of Colorado. Mr. President, I desire to say that any objection to this bill based upon the statement that the Ute Indian bill has proved a failure is at least very unjust. All the provisions of the Ute Indian bill have been carried out up to this time as far as it is possible to have done it. It is true no lands have yet been allotted, and the reason for that, as I have stated before, is that the work cannot be done in that certain part of the country in the winter. Time was required to accomplish the various purposes of the bill; that is, those which were precedent to the act of removing the Indians.

The law required that a complete census should be taken of these Indians. That census was not completed, I believe, until very late in the fall. I cannot state the exact date—perhaps my colleague can—but I know it was a late day in the fall. The money could not be paid till the census was taken. My colleague says this money was due to those Indians under former treaties. Perhaps it was due to them under former treaties. Nevertheless it was to be paid to them under the provisions of the act of Congress, and it could not be paid to them until the other provisions of the act had been executed. The result was that before the money could be taken from the Treasury for that purpose and sent to Colorado snow had fallen.

Now as to the matter of securing the signatures of those Indians; I was not present with the commission when the signatures of the Indians were obtained. I know nothing personally as to how they were obtained. My colleague has intimated that there was something wrong in the manner of obtaining the signatures. He was not present any more than I was when the signatures were taken. He has no other source of information than I have, and that is simply the report of the individual members of the commission. I have conversed with every member of the commission but one, and I never have heard it stated by one member of the commission that there was anything fraudulent or anything wrong or unfair in the manner in which this business was conducted. I have heard the statement plainly and unequivocally made by three of the commission that it was done with perfect freedom and fairness, and that no improper influence was brought to bear upon the Indians.

I do not know what further information my colleague can have upon that subject than that furnished by the commission, and I am very sure he cannot get any such information from the commission as he has indicated here. My colleague has alluded to the danger of an Indian war in Colorado, the danger which occurred last fall. I can state in a very few words all there is of it. An Indian was killed by a white man, a freighter on the road to the agency. That man was arrested. He was held in confinement at a house on the reservation. The Indians gathered around the house and demanded that he should be given up to them. The agent was there. Some of the members of the commission were there. There were several other persons present at the time. They refused to surrender him. Finally they agreed with the Indians that this man should be sent for trial to the town of Gunnison, and he was sent off in charge of four men. While on the road he was taken from the guard by the Indians. They seized him and carried him into the woods and shot him. Who is to be blamed for this proceeding I do not presume to say. The matter is in the courts now, and it will be tried there, and I hope the guilty party will be punished, whether he is an Indian or a white man. This unfortunate event created a good deal of excitement on the border; but what has that to do with the merits of this bill, or what has it to do with the general question of settling the Indians upon lands in severalty?

There has been a good deal said by the Senator from Alabama about the failure of the Secretary of the Interior to submit a report from the commission. When was that report called for? Not until just at the close of the session yesterday. I think at the very close of the session yesterday my colleague introduced a resolution calling on the Secretary for this report. He will make it. I have no doubt it will be here within a day or two. But what report can the commission make? They can only report what progress has thus far been made, and that will cover exactly the facts which I have stated here; the commission went to Colorado; they took the census of the Indians; they got the agreement ratified by three-fourths of them. The money has been paid, and there the matter rests. It remains now to remove the Indians to the place where the lands are to be allotted to them, and that will be done early in the spring, I have no doubt.

It is suggested to me by the Senator from Ohio that the resolution of my colleague did not reach the Secretary till this morning, and now it is intimated by a Senator that the Secretary of the Interior is guilty of some crime because he has not furnished the report of that commission when the resolution calling for it never reached him till this morning.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. WHYTE. I suggest to the Senator from Rhode Island that there are a number of nominations on the table.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Well, let us proceed to the consideration of executive business. I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After forty-four minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at five o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 28, 1881.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CONTESTED ELECTION—YEATES VS. MARTIN.

Mr. SPEER. Mr. Speaker, having charge of the contested-election case of Yeates vs. Martin, I desire to come to some understanding with the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. FIELD,] who has charge of the case as presented by the minority of the committee. I desire to know how much more time gentlemen on the other side desire for debate.

Mr. FIELD. So far as I have any authority or any information, I will say that two hours more time for debate on this side is all that we desire. If any member has any objection to such a proposition, I hope he will make it now.

Mr. VALENTINE. I understand there are four gentlemen on this side who desire to speak on this question.

Mr. FIELD. I am not so informed. If the gentleman knows of four, I wish he would state who they are.

Mr. VALENTINE. The gentleman from Texas, [Mr. JONES,] the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. CALKINS,] and I think there are two others.

Mr. SPEER. I am entirely willing to assent to the proposition of the gentleman having charge of the case on the other side, and if it is agreeable to the House, I will call the previous question at two o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. FIELD. After two hours more have been given to this side, whenever that may be.

Mr. KEIFER. I do not wish to interfere with the suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, except that I have been notified of three gentlemen who wish to speak on this side.

The SPEAKER. Do they want an hour each?

Mr. KEIFER. I do not believe they want to speak an hour each; but I cannot say anything positively about that.

Mr. SPEER. The proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts is entirely fair. I will say to my friend from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] that three hours have been occupied on that side already, and only one hour on this side. We propose to call the previous question at two o'clock to-morrow, giving the other side the two hours additional which the gentleman in charge of the case says will be required.

Mr. KEIFER. Unless some of the gentlemen desiring to speak should object to that proposition, I will not object.

Mr. SPEER. Then I will call the previous question two hours after the reading of the Journal to-morrow.

Mr. O'NEILL. I object to the limitation of two hours.

Mr. McMAHON. It is not competent for the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL] to object.

The SPEAKER. The whole matter is within the control of the House; but the respective parties in charge of the case have assented to two hours' additional debate on behalf of the minority report.

Mr. O'NEILL. I do not consider that they have absolutely accepted the two hours.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. I desire to make an inquiry. Was it not stated the other day by gentlemen on the other side that three hours would be regarded as fair time, and was not an assurance given by one gentleman on the other side that if such time were allowed there would be no factious opposition so far as his influence went?

The SPEAKER. It seems that a longer time than was originally contemplated is desired.

Mr. KEIFER. There was no agreement to the limit of three hours, I think.

The SPEAKER. So far as can be agreed, the understanding now is, as stated by the gentleman from Georgia, that two hours additional for debate will be allowed to gentlemen advocating the minority report, after which, the gentleman states, he will call the previous question.

Mr. KEIFER. In order that there may be no misunderstanding, I wish to state that, while I am not now objecting myself, there are other gentlemen who desire to speak and who may object to this limitation, though I think they can arrange to speak within the time indicated.

Mr. SPEER. I trust so, Mr. Speaker, because it was distinctly understood, when I consented to a postponement of this case for a day when it was first called up, that after ample time had been allowed for debate there would be no dilatory proceedings.

Mr. KEIFER. The statement of the gentleman is entirely correct; but I did state that we wanted a fair time for discussion, and that a fair time for discussion was so long as gentlemen in good faith desired to debate the question. I assent to what the gentleman has said in that respect.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. If no agreement is reached I hope the gentleman from Georgia will now call the previous question.

Mr. SPEER. I stand by my statement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia does not call the previous question.

Mr. SPEER. I do not call the previous question now; but I give notice (and I trust there will be no objection to this) that to-morrow, two hours after the reading of the Journal, I will call the previous question.

Mr. KEIFER. That would depend upon whether we have a morning hour to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. This question would take precedence of the morning hour.

Mr. SPEER. After two hours more have been given for debate on the other side, I will call the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not now claim the floor so as to interfere with the consideration of private business to-day?

Mr. SPEER. No, sir; I do not desire to antagonize private bills.

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understood.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. COX. I rise to a privileged report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman had better move, in the first place, that the morning hour be dispensed with.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I make that motion; to dispense with the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The Private Calendar is large enough without further additional reports from committees. The only effect of receiving reports in private cases from committees would be to place the matters where they could not be reached. The Chair thinks the hour had better be devoted to the consideration of private bills already on the Calendar.

The motion of Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, was agreed to, (two-thirds voting in favor thereof,) and the morning hour for the reception of reports from committees was dispensed with.

HALIFAX FISHERIES AWARD.

Mr. COX. I rise to make the following privileged report from the Committee on Foreign Affairs; which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to communicate to this House all information in the State Department not heretofore communicated to Congress in reference to the Halifax fisheries award of $5,550,000 paid by this Government to Great Britain, and especially relating to the alleged fictitious statistics and perjured testimony imposed on the arbitrators, and upon which evidence the award was made. And also, whether this Government has taken any steps to procure a verification of the recently published statement of Professor Henry Youle Hind on this subject.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. COX moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TORPEDOES.

The SPEAKER. There are several such resolutions which the Chair will now recognize, there being no objection.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I send to the Clerk's desk a substitute reported by the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department for the resolution referred to that committee.

The SPEAKER. The substitute will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and hereby is, directed to communicate to this House any proposals which may have been made to the Navy Department for sale to the United States of torpedoes during the past two years, together with all reports which may have been made by officers of the United States Navy with regard to torpedoes. Also to inform the House what sums of money have been appropriated and expended for experiments with torpedoes under direction of the Navy Department during said period, and that he will communicate any other information on this subject not inconsistent with the public interest.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I ask the adoption of the substitute in lieu of the original resolution.

Mr. O'NEILL. I object to that.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the resolution has to be reported within one week.

Mr. O'NEILL. I understand that; but does it not require unanimous consent to consider it now?

The SPEAKER. Not to come in.

Mr. O'NEILL. Very well, then; I hope the gentleman will have better luck than I had, for the resolution I had referred to the Committee on Appropriations for the completion sufficiently of the post-office building in the city of Philadelphia to allow its occupancy for post-office purposes has been buried in that committee now for two or three weeks.

Mr. CONGER. The latter part of the resolution seems to provide that the information should be furnished if not incompatible with the public interest, but that does not refer to the other part of the resolution.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman will see there is absolute requirement there shall be a report on the first part, while the latter part provides the information shall be furnished if not inconsistent with the public interest. It seems to me the subject of torpedo experiment is a secret in the control of this Government, and ought to be kept so except so far as this House ought to have that information. This would require that information in regard to our torpedo system should be given the gentleman which perhaps ought not to be. Under the circumstances I hope the resolution will be amended by making the clause "if not inconsistent with the public interest" relate to the whole resolution.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I am not authorized by the committee to accept any amendment; but I do not see any objection to the modification proposed by the gentleman from Michigan.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and the modification is adopted.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I think the resolution accomplishes the same purpose now.

The substitute, as modified, was agreed to, and the resolution, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION REPORTS.

Mr. HAYES, from the Committee on Printing, reported back joint resolution (H. R. No. 364) providing for the printing of the Smithsonian Institution reports, and for other purposes, with amendments.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, &c., That 3,000 copies of each of the reports of the Smithsonian Institution, together with the documentary history and journals and life and writings of James Smithson, with illustrations, be printed from the stereotype plates now in the Congressional Printing Office, of which 1,500 shall be for the use of the House, 500 for the use of the Senate, and 1,000 for the use of the Smithsonian Institution.

The amendments were read, as follows:

Line 4, after the words "together with," strike out "documentary history and journals and."

Line 8, after the words "five hundred," insert "and fifteen."

Lines 9 and 10 strike out the words "one thousand" and insert in lieu thereof "nine hundred and eighty-five."

The amendments were agreed to; and the joint resolution, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HAYES moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ASSISTANT TO JOURNAL CLERK.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a privileged report from the Committee on Accounts. The committee report favorably upon the following resolution referred to them.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk be, and he is hereby, authorized to employ for the remainder of the session one additional clerk, who shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House the compensation paid to committee clerks.

Mr. DUNNELL. Where is this additional clerk to be employed?

The SPEAKER. At the desk, to assist the journal clerk, in consequence of the lameness of his hand by reason of constant writing. The report will be read.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred a resolution authorizing the employment of one additional clerk in the office of the Clerk of the House for the remainder of the session, having carefully considered the same, respectfully report that the additional clerk here asked for is necessary on two grounds: First, an increasing pressure of work in the Clerk's office, always incident to the close of a session of Congress; second, the physical disability of the journal clerk by reason of what is known as pen-paralysis. The committee therefore unanimously recommend the passage of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. HENRY moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. HUBBELL. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to ask unanimous consent to print some remarks in the RECORD upon the joint resolution regulating the count of the electoral vote for President and Vice-President.

There was no objection. [See Appendix.]

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES OF DOMESTIC ANIMALS.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a privileged report from the Committee on Printing, on House joint resolution No. 362, referred to that committee.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

The CLERK. "Joint resolution (H. R. No. 362) to authorize the printing of 100,000 copies of the special report of the Commissioner of Agriculture, relative to diseases of swine, and infectious and contagious diseases incident to other domestic animals;" with amendments.

Mr. WILSON. Let the report be read, which will indicate the amendments proposed by the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Printing, having considered the accompanying joint resolution to authorize the printing of an extra edition of the special report, No. 34, of the Commissioner of Agriculture, having considered the same, respectfully report it back to the House with the following amendments:

"In line 3 strike out the words 'one hundred' and insert in lieu thereof 'fifty;' in line 8 strike out '60,000' and insert in lieu thereof '30,000;' in line 9 strike out the word 'twenty-five' and insert in lieu thereof 'twelve;' in lines 10 and 11 strike out the words 'fifteen thousand' and insert in lieu thereof 'seventy-seven hundred.'"

These amendments propose to reduce the number of copies ordered to be printed one-half, and in the distribution to avoid any surplusage in the hands of any officer of Congress.

The cost of the publication of an edition of 100,000 copies will be about forty-two thousand dollars; of an edition of 50,000 copies the cost will be a little more than one-half of said sum.

The committee respectfully recommend the passage of the resolution with the above amendments.

Amend the title, to read "50,000 copies" instead of "100,000 copies."

The amendments were agreed to.

The joint resolution, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was read the third time, and passed.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS.

Mr. GUNTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill 818, to provide for ascertaining and settling private land claims in certain States and Territories, and ask that the same be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

POSTAL LAWS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to present the petition I hold in my hand, from 10,000 citizens of the United States, on the subject of the postal laws. The petition is brief and respectful, and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD without the names and referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Mr. CONGER. What is that petition?

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. It is in reference to the postal laws of the United States.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The gentleman does not ask the printing of more than the petition; he does not ask the printing of the names.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The petition is as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

1. The undersigned citizens of the United States respectfully but earnestly remonstrate and petition against any further legislation by your honorable bodies in the form of postal laws or otherwise, which shall have the effect to abridge the freedom of the press and of speech and the inviolability of the mails.

2. Your petitioners pray that the postal laws of the United States may be revised and limited to purely postal purposes and brought clearly within the Constitution, and that all attempts to establish a censorship and espionage over the mails, based upon the sentiments and meaning of the matter mailed, may be abandoned, and that all fines and imprisonment heretofore imposed under such laws may be repaid or relieved.

3. Your petitioners respectfully represent that their motive in signing this petition is not sympathy with nor a desire to further the evils against which those laws are ostensibly directed, and which your petitioners believe can otherwise be obviated, but from the conviction that those laws on the part of the General Government are dangerous in themselves, that they have been grievously abused, and that as precedents they plainly fall within the warning of President Madison:

"It is proper to take alarm at the first experiment on our liberties. We hold this prudent jealousy to be the first duty of citizens, and one of the noblest characteristics of the late Revolution. The free men of America did not delay until usurped power had strengthened itself by exercise and entangled the question in precedents. They saw all the consequences in the principle, and they avoided the consequences by denying the principle. We revere this lesson too much soon to forget it."

Your petitioners therefore earnestly submit that those laws should be repealed or limited to strictly postal purposes, and that the criminal or other objects of government sought to be obtained by them should be attained by the ordinary course of governmental administration.

And your petitioners will ever pray, &c.

PRIVATE BUSINESS ON THE CALENDAR.

Mr. COFFROTH. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 92, noes 42.

So the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, Mr. HUNTON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the Private Calendar. The Clerk will report the first bill upon the Private Calendar.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 3784) to compensate Asa Weeks for his labor in perfecting torpedoes and torpedo machinery and the art of torpedo warfare for the sole and exclusive benefit of the United States and for other purposes.

Mr. MORSE. My colleague, [Mr. HARRIS of Massachusetts,] in charge of this bill, not being here, I move that it be passed over.

Mr. FINLEY. I hope that the bill will be passed over for the present.

There was no objection and it was ordered accordingly.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next bill upon the Calendar.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 936) relinquishing the right of the United States to an island therein named.

MARK WALKER.

Mr. O'NEILL. I wish to ask a parliamentary question, Mr. Chairman. The committee rose on last Friday week, while we had under consideration a bill for the reinstatement of Mark Walker in the Army. Does not that bill keep its place upon the Calendar?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the bill to which the gentleman from Pennsylvania refers will come up in the House after the committee shall rise.

Mr. O'NEILL. The Chair is under a misapprehension. The committee rose while that bill was under consideration without having ordered it to be presented to the House. I looked for that bill of course to be at the top of the Calendar to-day.

Mr. BROWNE. That bill I presumed was passed in Committee of the Whole, and has been reported to the House, and will not come up until we go back into the House.

Mr. O'NEILL. No, sir, that is not the case; the gentleman is mistaken. The committee rose while that bill was under consideration before it was reported to the House. I only wish that it had passed the committee. The bill to which I refer is House bill No. 249 for the relief of Mark Walker. The committee rose while that bill was under consideration, and of course under the rules I hold that the bill comes up first.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is correct; the bill to which he refers was not concluded when the committee rose at its last session. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the provisions of law regulating appointments in the Army are hereby suspended for the purpose of this act, and only so far as they affect Mark Walker, late first lieutenant Nineteenth United States Infantry, and the President can, if he so desire, in the exercise of his own discretion and judgment, nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint said Mark Walker, late first lieutenant Nineteenth United States Infantry, to the same grade and rank of first lieutenant held by him on May 13, 1878, and that the said Walker shall thereupon be placed upon the retired list of the Army, provided the same shall be recommended by the retiring board: Provided, That the acceptance of the provisions of this act shall be a waiver of all rights, present and prospective, under the pension laws of the United States.

Mr. ROBINSON. Let the report be read.

Mr. O'NEILL. The report was read and will be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, pages 648 and 649.

Mr. SPARKS. I ask that the report be again read.

The report was again read.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

Here the committee informally rose, and Mr. BLACKBURN took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed, without amendment, bills of the House of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 7029) to provide for a deficiency in the appropriation for interest on the 3.65 loan of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. No. 6025) to establish an assay office in the city of Saint Louis, Missouri.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House was requested, bills of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 6969) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4050) to divide the State of Louisiana into two judicial districts.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed bills and a joint resolution of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. No. 2096) to authorize the construction and maintenance of a railway bridge across the Niagara River;

A bill (S. No. 1905) changing the name of the First National Bank of West Meriden, in the county of New Haven and State of Connecticut;

A bill (S. No. 1843) to authorize the Secretary of War to grant the use of certain lands at Fortress Monroe, Virginia, for the erection of a hotel;

A bill (S. No. 159) to provide for the sale of certain portions of the Fort Leavenworth military reservation; and

A joint resolution (S. No. 143) authorizing the inspection and issue of an American register to the Egyptian steamship Dessoug.

MARK WALKER.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on laying the bill aside to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. DIBRELL. When this bill was up for consideration on the last private bill day I moved to strike out the enacting clause. The report which has been read is an elaborate argument made by a claim agent in this city for the benefit of the claimant. No member of the committee has ever written such a lengthy report on that claim.

Mr. O'NEILL. I think that statement is a great reflection on the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. DIBRELL. The main question is whether Congress will put this man on the retired list which was created for the benefit of officers who have served for a long time in the Army of the United States or who have been disabled by wounds and disease contracted in the service; whether they will take a man who has been cashiered and dismissed the service for drunkenness on duty and put him on the retired list. The act creating the retired list limits it to four hundred. I understand there are on it now three hundred and ninety-nine, and the addition of this man will make the four hundred. The retired list costs the tax-payers of the country $900,000.

This man has been drawing a pension at the rate of $24 a month, and has been drawing that pension for some time. That is ample for a man who was tried by a military commission for drunkenness on duty, pleaded guilty, was sentenced by that commission to be discharged from the service, and whose sentence of dismissal was confirmed by the President. I think it would be a great outrage on soldiers placed on the retired list for meritorious service to have this man forced among them with equal rank, because he was dismissed from the service for having disgraced himself and the uniform he wore. I renew my motion.

Mr. WHITE. Will the gentleman from Tennessee allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DIBRELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. WHITE. I was not present at the meeting of the Committee on Military Affairs, of which I am a member, when this bill was considered. Did I correctly understand the gentleman from Tennessee, my colleague on the committee, to say that this officer was tried by a military commission—regularly tried?

Mr. DIBRELL. Yes, sir. He was tried by a regular court-martial, pleaded guilty to the charge of drunkenness on duty, and was sentenced to be dismissed by the court-martial.

Mr. WHITE. Do I correctly understand that he receives a pension of $24 a month?

Mr. DIBRELL. He does.

Mr. WHITE. How did he receive a pension after dismissal from the service?

Mr. DIBRELL. I do not know. He does receive that pension. The report so states.

Mr. WHITE. Was the pension bestowed under the general law or by special act?

Mr. DIBRELL. I do not know.

Mr. HAWLEY. He got it through, being a volunteer, independently of the sentence of the court-martial.

Mr. BROWNE. I regret exceedingly the Committee on Military Affairs seems to have forgotteen they have made a favorable report on this case. The bill seems to have been reported by the authority of the committee; and I have a somewhat distinct recollection that the committee authorized the report to be made.

Mr. DIBRELL. My colleague will not say the report was unanimous, I reckon.

Mr. BROWNE. It is sufficient, Mr. Chairman, that the committee authorized a favorable report.

Now, what are the facts in this case? Mark Walker was for seventeen years in the volunteer and regular service, an officer without reproach. He is not a drunkard; it is not so alleged; it does not so appear in the proof. While in the regular line of duty he incurred disease. He is physically a wreck, and that is the result of his military service. There is no question that his disability was incurred in the line of his duty. Under the law he was as much entitled to go on the retired list of the Army as if he had been wounded in battle. Just at the time he had made his application to be retired, and had been denied because at the time there existed no vacancy, he was unfortunately in a single instance so far under the influence of intoxicating liquors that it was observable by those who witnessed his presence on undress parade.

The report of the Committee on Military Affairs shows his physical condition at that time; it was one of great suffering. I do not say that we should mitigate the offense of using intoxicating liquors; but I do say that if every officer of the Army of the United States should be dismissed by court-martial for an offense of this character we would not have enough commissions in the Army perhaps to take charge of a platoon.

Mr. McMILLIN. Do I understand the gentleman to charge that all the officers of the Army get drunk?

Mr. BROWNE. No, sir; I do not charge anything of the kind. I say that if men who may be found simply in the condition which the facts show Mark Walker to have been in on this occasion shall be dismissed the service, it would diminish very materially the number of officers in the Army.

As I have said, we have the case here in a nutshell; there should be no controversy about it. An officer who has performed faithful service for seventeen years, and who during the time of his service incurred disabilities in the line of his duty which have made him a physical wreck, at a time when he was entitled to a place on the retired list, is unfortunately found in that one single instance, against the whole current of his past life, in a state of partial inebriation. A court-martial is convened for his trial, but he is in such condition that for thirty days the court had to adjourn from day to day so that he might be in a condition to enable him to appear before it. When he did appear he pleaded guilty, and under the inexorable rule of military law, without sympathy and without pity, he is dismissed the military service of the United States.

Mr. BLAND. I would like to ask the gentleman——

Mr. BROWNE. In a moment.

Mr. BLAND. Merely a matter of information.

Mr. BROWNE. Certainly, with pleasure.

Mr. BLAND. I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] if there was so much excuse for his offense, because of his condition requiring him to take intoxicating liquors for the benefit of his health, why was not that fact laid before the military tribunal? Why did he plead guilty?

Mr. BROWNE. He plead guilty, for what reason I do not know. But a man afflicted as he was, perhaps without the benefit of counsel, conscious of the fact that he was at the time under the influence of intoxicating liquor, might well plead guilty. I cannot see that it is any worse for him to have gone into that tribunal and acknowledged the fact without putting the Government to the trouble of proving it, than if he had delayed the court for days and days by controverting the charge and at the end been found guilty.

I suppose another reason why he plead guilty was that he entertained the hope that, under the circumstances, his long and gallant services would be taken into consideration—his record without a blemish, a record of which any officer of the Government might be proud. He might have hoped that, having regard to all that, the authorities would mitigate the punishment and that he would not be dismissed the service of the United States.

I regret that officers of the Army and men out of the Army are in the habit of using intoxicating liquors. I would, if it were possible, that every officer of the Republic was qualified by reason of his daily walk and conversation to be the superintendent of a Sabbath school or the president of the Young Men's Christian Association. But that is not so, and I do not think that it is indispensable to efficiency in military life that it should be so.

We select men for this business of throat-cutting and brain-bespattering, this general business of death-dealing, because of their courage, because of their ability to command, because they are fitted for that particular service. They are selected, I say, for these reasons. But I apprehend it ought not to be regarded as an insuperable objection to a man going out of active service and upon the retired list of the Army, that in a single instance and upon one occasion he has been intoxicated.

I hope the Congress of the United States will not set this precedent, that they will not permit the ignominy and obloquy of a dismissal from the service of the United States to attach to the record of an officer who has had so long a gallant and distinguished career. I say I hope the Congress of the United States will not permit that record to remain upon this gallant soldier simply because he was guilty of this one mistake, or, if you please, of this single crime against the military law.

Some of my colleagues on the Committee on Military Affairs seem to be opposed to this restoration. I suppose that if this officer had simply betrayed his trust as a commanding general, if he had been under some grave suspicion of having betrayed his country to the enemy, of having failed in the presence of the enemy to execute some important order upon which the result of a great battle hinged, and had been found guilty of the offense charged, of that great crime, by a properly constituted court-martial—I suppose this Congress would be expected with alacrity to come forward to remove that record and restore that officer either to his position in the service or create for him a rank and put him upon the retired list, thereby making him a pensioner of all the people.

But Mark Walker was not a general; he was not a colonel. He went into the service as a private, and rose by his merits until he became a major, or perhaps in the regular service a lieutenant. He was at one time a citizen of my State—I believe he is a native of it; and by his military career he has added luster to the history of a State that has written on the battle-fields of the Republic a record which challenges the admiration of the nation if not of the world.

I hope, Mr. Chairman, that this report of the Military Committee will be sustained by the Committee of the Whole, and that we shall recommend to the House the passage of this bill.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER obtained the floor.

Mr. STEPHENS addressed the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] next.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I desire to offer an amendment to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will please send up his amendment.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER, (after a pause.) I believe I will withhold my amendment for the present.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman retain the floor?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. No, sir; I relinquish the floor.

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. Chairman, I do not know what amendment the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHALLENBERGER] intends to submit; but I wish to say that I am in favor of the passage of this bill. I know Mark Walker; and I know that what the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] has said of him is true. He is physically a wreck—a wreck not from intemperance, not from too free indulgence in intoxicating liquor, but from rheumatism. That rheumatism, as shown by the evidence before the Committee on Military Affairs, was contracted in the service of the United States. There is no evidence that I have seen or heard of that Captain Walker was an habitual drunkard.

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas. He was not.

Mr. STEPHENS. I understand he was not. I know not how the fact was; but there is in the evidence no such allegation. Now, the testimony is that upon the occasion in question Captain Walker, feeling an attack of rheumatism coming on, took a dose of morphine, and after that took some intoxicating drink. All persons who know the effect of morphine with an intoxicating draught after it, know that the tendency is to unduly excite the brain temporarily. There is no evidence that Captain Walker was ever in that condition before or ever failed to discharge his duty faithfully. His physical suffering, his present wrecked condition, arose from exposure, to which he was subjected in the discharge of his duty in the field. I wish to say nothing further, except that in my judgment this man should be put upon the retired list, as he ought to have been before he was called out on that dress parade.

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Chairman, in connection with the closing remark of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] I will make a statement. Long before this court-martial convened, Lieutenant Mark Walker, of the regular Army, formerly a major of volunteers, and subsequently breveted a captain in the regular Army for gallant conduct, had applied to be put on the retired list. He had made his application through me, having become a citizen of my district where his friends resided. That application was refused, not because he was not worthy to be placed upon the retired list, but, as General Townsend, late Adjutant-General of the Army, states in his communication, because there were nearly four hundred applications in advance of his. At that time, in view of all the facts of this case, which were well known to me, in view of the whole history of the man, with whom I have been well acquainted since he came to reside in Philadelphia within the boundaries of my district, I begged the Secretary of War and the Adjutant-General to grant an order placing him upon the retired list. The Secretary of War himself did not seem to be so much opposed to it, because subsequently, when the proceedings of this court-martial had been sent to the War Department, that official hoped to find that this circumstance of Captain Walker's reeling at dress parade (which I believe, as the committee report, was the effect of a dose of morphine) had happened at least one day in advance of the President's order relative to drunkenness, so that he might have recommended to the President that the sentence be mitigated and that he be returned to his position. I state this of my own knowledge.

I give Lieutenant Walker all credit for pleading guilty. The court had been convened and had adjourned; it had not done any business for thirty-four or thirty-five days, but had been adjourned from day to day through the kindness of members of the court, to suit the convenience of Lieutenant Walker. Finding that his health was failing, that he was not getting better, Lieutenant Walker, a sick man, scarcely able to walk to the room where the court was convened, came before it and pleaded guilty like a man. He did not even set up the excuse that the trouble was "malaria." [Laughter.] He had not the opportunity to state to the court that the judge-advocate of the court and the principal witness ready to come before it were his juniors as lieutenants.

Now I will say to my friend from Tennessee [Mr. DIBRELL] that I might just as well state that there was perhaps some interest on his part for these gentlemen who were juniors of Lieutenant Walker, as for the gentleman from Tennessee to say that some claim agent in Washington prepared this report. The report in this case was prepared by one of the members of this House who stands to-day the peer of the gentleman from Tennessee, and who is fit to draw a report upon any case submitted to him.

Mr. DIBRELL. I of course meant no reflection upon the gentleman who made the report in this case; but I know it is customary for these claim agents to bring in these long reports, for I have had them submitted to me; but I have never adopted one of them and never expect to do so.

Mr. O'NEILL. I do not know what may be the custom of members of the Military Committee in the preparation of their reports; I know nothing about that. But, sir, this poor man, broken down in health, not able to be out of his bed to-day to watch the progress of his case, still suffering from this same fearful malady, acute rheumatism—this poor man who happened to come under the order of the President of the United States by just three weeks, is discharged from the Army; and when appeals are made to the President to reinstate him the application is not granted.

Mr. Chairman, there is no member in this House less willing than I am to make excuses for men the habit of whose life is to get intoxicated. There is no member who feels more deeply than I do that the great curse of the earth is rum and rum-drinking—a greater curse, indeed, than war or disease or the most fearful pestilence. I do not wish to stand here, therefore, to make defense for any man who is a habitual drunkard; but I do say to this House that from the beginning to the end of this case my friend from Tennessee [Mr. DIBRELL] and my friend from Illinois, [Mr. SPARKS,] the chairman of the Committe on Military Affairs, have opposed it step by step. I do say that the whole of this case from the beginning to the end shows Mark Walker to have been a gallant soldier, and, as my friend from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] has very well said in his remarks this morning, deserving kindness, worthy of clemency, if for no other reason than because of this dreadful disease brought upon him by the services which he rendered the country. Why, sir, if this court-martial had been held within the last year instead of within three weeks after the President's order had been promulgated saying no clemency would be shown where there had been drunkenness, I feel that I am justified in stating in this case even the same clemency would have been shown by the President of the United States that has been shown by him to eleven officers in the Army, the records of whose trials and convictions on charges of drunkenness I hold in my hand. As in these cases, I believe the President of the United States, in his discretion and good judgment and merciful feeling, would have mitigated the sentence of Mark Walker just as he has done these eleven other officers to whom I have referred.

Mr. HOUSE. I wish to ask the gentleman a question for information. Does he yield for that purpose?

Mr. O'NEILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOUSE. Was this officer charged with only a single act?

Mr. O'NEILL. Yes, sir, that is all; and charged by a junior lieutenant, who was the witness ready to go before the court. The judge-advocate also was a junior lieutenant.

Now, sir, per contra, the president of that court-martial wrote a letter stating that clemency ought to be shown to Mark Walker, who having plead guilty to this single offense, occurring under the circumstances already related, had under the Army regulations to be sentenced to dismissal, and from the further fact that he was a true soldier with a most honorable record.

Mr. SPARKS. The accusation was drunkenness, and he plead guilty to that. I do not suppose there could be any specification that he was drunk all the time.

Mr. O'NEILL. The specification was that he was drunk on undress parade, and that is all the specification there was. He was followed, I presume, at the time by this junior lieutenant, who was ready to appear before the court-martial and swear away the gallant record of this man during the whole war of the rebellion, for a single offense of staggering.

Mr. HOUSE. What I wish to know is whether this officer is a habitual drunkard, whether he got repeatedly drunk, or whether there is only one act of drunkenness charged against him?

Mr. O'NEILL. Only one act is shown by this record, and no other allegation is made. The president of the court-martial recommended mercy and clemency, and the Judge-Advocate General of the Army, General Dunn, recently retired, also recommended clemency. The surgeons who saw this officer in his sickness for several years have certified because of acute rheumatism and some affection of the heart, I think, he had undergone a treatment of morphine and stimulants, and yet, notwithstanding that fact, he always was ready to do duty every day, taking but a leave of absence of a few months only in the course of years of intense suffering. Surgeon Basil Norris, of the United States Army, said that he should not have been on duty for three or four years, but should have had leave of absence until he had recovered.

Now, Mr. Chairman, after the records which are here in the case of these eleven officers who have been restored to their positions in the Army, and in whose cases the sentences of courts-martial had been mitigated, all of them having been convicted of drunkenness upon various occasions—here are their records, and gentlemen can look at them, but I do not wish to read the names as I do not wish to bring before the country the recollection of the fact that these men were convicted of drunkenness and other charges too; but, sir, in view of the fact that these eleven officers were restored to their rank in the Army after short suspensions, I do not see how any man can refuse to vote in favor of this case.

Mr. McCOOK. My friend from Pennsylvania will allow me. He has given his personal knowledge of this man, but he did not, however, to the satisfaction of my mind at all events, answer fully the question propounded by the gentleman from Tennessee in reference to the specific charge for which this man was tried and convicted, that is, drunkenness on duty. A man may be an habitual drunkard and yet never found drunk on duty. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania inform me for my personal information as to his personal knowledge of the habits of Mark Walker?

Mr. O'NEILL. I reply confining myself to the record. [Laughter.]

Mr. McCOOK. You spoke of your personal knowledge.

Mr. O'NEILL. Yes; and I speak of that too. But in the first place I refer to the record before the House. He was charged with drunkenness on duty. The specification is—let me read from the record.

Charge—Drunkenness on duty, in violation of the thirty-eighth article of war.
Specification: In that First Lieutenant Mark Walker, Nineteenth Infantry, being on duty in command of his company at undress-parade at retreat at Fort Lyon, Colorado, on or about December 24, 1877, was found drunk.
To which charge and specification the accused, First Lieutenant Mark Walker, Nineteenth Infantry, pleaded "Guilty."

I never knew him to be a drunkard. I never knew him to be an habitual drinker except as he was advised by the surgeon to take stimulants, which we all know are prescribed at times for this dreadful disease of acute rheumatism. Here he is to-day in the city of Washington lying in bed fearfully sick, where he has been for nearly two weeks, suffering in the same way, and, for all I know, using the same stimulants prescribed for him while he was in the Army. And yet, sir, eleven men have been restored. I do not know but that every man who has been tried by a court-martial in the Army for drunkenness may have been reinstated. Now, we only ask under this bill to put this man on the retired list, or authorize the President, if he shall so desire, to recommend him to the Senate to be placed upon the retired list, and then if that is done he relinquishes, of course, his pension. Nothing more is asked than that.

Mr. SPARKS. Mr. Chairman, when the House was in Committee of the Whole and had this question before it on a preceding day, this case was quite fully discussed, and would have then been disposed of but for the desire of a majority that the committee should rise. I want to state now, as then, to this committee, that personally I know nothing of this man. I know nothing further of him than is presented to us by the record and proofs in this case. I think that every member of the committee will agree with me that it will be well for the Army that all incompetent officers shall be got out of the service. No gentleman has taken higher ground upon that question than the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] who has preceded me in this discussion in favor of this bill. A military man himself, and a good one, he has felt the great importance of clearing the Army of incompetent and worthless officers. A day or two ago a bill was ordered to be reported from that committee for the organization of a permanent board of well-selected Army officers with a view to accomplish this very thing, which met the sanction and approval of that gentleman. Now, what are the facts in the case here presented to this committee as appear of record? A court-martial was convened to try a charge and specifications against this man Walker. Now let me read that charge and the specifications:

Charge—Drunkenness on duty, in violation of the thirty-eight article of war.
Specification: In that First Lieutenant Mark Walker, Nineteenth Infantry, being on duty in command of his company at undress-parade at retreat at Fort Lyon, Colorado, on or about December 24, 1877, was found drunk.
To which charge and specification the accused, First Lieutenant Mark Walker, Nineteenth Infantry, pleaded "Guilty."

This charge and the specification were carefully examined and passed upon by the court-martial.

Now, I will read the finding and sentence of the court, and also the approval of the President of the same.

Finding.—The court, having maturely considered the evidence adduced, finds the accused, First Lieutenant Mark Walker, Nineteenth Infantry, as follows:
Of the specification, "Guilty."
Of the charge, "Guilty."
Sentence.—And the court does therefore sentence him, First Lieutenant Mark Walker, Nineteenth Infantry, "to be dismissed the service of the United States."
II. The record of the proceedings of the general court-martial in the foregoing case of First Lieutenant Mark Walker, Nineteenth Infantry, having been forwarded to the Secretary of War, and by him submitted to the President of the United States for his action, the following are his orders thereon, namely:

"EXECUTIVE MANSION, April 23, 1878.

"The foregoing proceedings, findings, and sentence of the general court-martial in the case of First Lieutenant Mark Walker, Nineteenth Infantry, are confirmed.
"R. B. HAYES."

Here we have the entire case. An effort was being made on the part of the military authorities to get rid of men who were disgracing the Army. Here is a charge against this man of drunkenness on duty. A court-martial is regularly organized; they pass upon the facts and take the admission of the accused to the truth of these facts. They find him guilty as charged in the specification. They sentence him to dismissal from the Army and that sentence is approved by the President of the United States. These are the facts and the entire facts submitted to us by the record. Now, we are asked in the passage of this bill to restore that man to the Army in the rank which he then held, and of which he was deprived by said court-martial, in order that he may go upon the retired list of that rank. I protest, Mr. Chairman, in the name of the tax-payers of this country, against this; I protest in the name of the good officers in the Army, and for the efficiency of the service, that this shall not be done. This, sir, I do without a particle of prejudice against this man, and without any knowlege of the facts except what is set forth in the record, and admitted by him and his advocates to be true.

I presume he has been a good soldier; I know nothing to the contrary. But he has been dismissed from the service after a fair and regular trial and sentence of a court-martial on a grave charge for a grave offense, and that dismissal after mature consideration has been affirmed by the Executive. By virtue thereof he is now out, and I think he should remain there. Besides that, sir, (how I do not know,) he has been pensioned. The gentleman from Indiana and the gentleman from Pennsylvania speak of his disability. I presume that he is disabled from the fact that he made application to the Pension Bureau for a pension and is now drawing a pension at the rate of $24 a month, and under the arrears act has received further a very considerable sum of money. All this he has received in consideration of the wounds, injuries, and disability incurred by him in service. Now, sir, I think, judging from the record and a fair consideration of the character of the man, that he has been paid all that is due to him. But he wants Congress, and that is the object of this special bill, (for the law keeps him where he is,) to specifically designate him exceptionally as a proper person to go upon the retired list and get thereby four times the pension he is now drawing. In my judgment, sir, many a worthier man is going without any pension at all at this moment.

Mr. O'NEILL. Then it is because their claims are shut up on the Private Calendar, and by the fact that we do not consider it every Friday and stick to it.

Mr. SPARKS. Is the gentleman charging me with being a hinderance in that direction?

Mr. O'NEILL. No, sir; but I am simply stating the reason why they do not get their rights.

Mr. SPARKS. If the gentleman does not allude to me, of course it is not incumbent upon me to answer him.

Mr. O'NEILL. I only wanted to get that on the record as a fact.

Mr. SPARKS. All right.

So far as the report now before us is concerned nothing whatever, I apprehend, need to be said. The majority of the Committee on Military Affairs reported favorably in the case. That is certainly true or it would not be here thus reported. I do not remember the minute details of the case, but presume that must be the fact or it would not now be before the Committee of the Whole. I do not know who drew the report, nor is it material. It is here with whatever benefit the sanction of the majority of the committee can give it. I was not and am not of that majority, but as a member of the minority, and believing that the case is not meritorious but absolutely unjust, oppose it.

Mr. BROWNE. Will my colleague on the committee at that point allow me——

Mr. SPARKS. Certainly.

Mr. BROWNE. I disclaim any purpose of reflecting on the committee.

Mr. SPARKS. I did not understand the gentleman to do so.

Mr. BROWNE. I simply said what I did in response to my colleague from Tennessee, who said the committee had employed a claim agent to get up the report.

Mr. DIBRELL. I did not say the committee employed a claim agent. I know it is customary for claim agents to get up reports.

Mr. SPARKS. I think the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] mistook the statement of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. DIBRELL.] But in any case the report must have been submitted to the committee and concurred in by the majority before it was presented to the House. So there is nothing in the manner of getting up the report to cavil about. This is the whole of the case in a nutshell. Are we going to take this man and put him back into the Army so that he can go on an overfilled retired list—a man who has violated the rules and regulations of the Army, who has admitted his guilt, and who, by a regularly organized court-martial, has been sentenced to dismissal, that sentence having been confirmed by the President, and who is now out of the service drawing a very considerable pension? Or, he being now out of the service, ought we not to say to him, remain there?

I regret that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] should have gone outside of this record to bring in here another case now pending on the Calendar, and to lecture members of the committee who take different views from himself in regard to it. I desire to say to the gentleman, however, that that case is by no means analogous to the one now before us. He alluded to the Porter case (if I correctly interpreted him) by saying "that gentlemen have sanctioned the restoration of high officers who were found by court-martial guilty of unfaithfulness and disobedience of orders when a great and decisive battle was impending," &c. It is true that in that case a court-martial did convict. But it is equally true that the accused did then, and has from that hour to this protested his innocence, in which he has been sustained very largely by the press and the best sentiment of the country. And it is not unknown to the gentleman that in a subsequent examination of that case by three of the most eminent military men of this country and age, (Generals Schofield, Terry, and Getty,) after more than ten months' patient consideration, they most fully and completely exonerated him from all the charges preferred against him, and in their report, instead of finding guilt, allege that—

Porter's faithful, subordinate, and intelligent conduct that afternoon saved the Union Army from defeat, &c.

And further, speaking of the disasters of the engagement, that—

Whoever else may have been responsible, it did not flow from any action or inaction of his.

And still further, speaking of the court-martial findings:

We believe not one among all the gallant soldiers on that bloody field was less deserving of such condemnation than he.

But, sir, the Porter case is not now up for consideration, and has no relevancy. The case now before the committee is a plain one. It is simply a question of whether or not, through sympathy, we shall take this man Walker from where he has placed himself and put him to the detriment, as I think, of an efficient service, in the Army on the retired list, there to draw pay at the rate of 75 per cent. of the full rank of a position which he by his own misconduct disgraced and forfeited.

Mr. BROWNE. Just a moment. I certainly did not intend directly to allude to any case pending before Congress or anywhere. What I meant to say was that we day after day have been considering the applications of men who were in high commission in the Army, putting them upon the retired list in ranks above the ranks held by them; doing that after they had retired from the service by resignation. We have, in other words, been in haste to compliment men who held distinguished positions and high rank in the Army. I protest that while we have been doing this in behalf of colonels, brigadiers, and major-generals, we ought to do something for men in a more humble rank who, perhaps, did not perform service so conspicuous, but who to the extent of their power and authority performed their duties equally well. I say let us now do something for a meritorious lieutenant, after we have done so much for colonels, brigadiers, and major-generals.

Mr. DIBRELL. Will the gentleman answer me one question?

Mr. BROWNE. I shall endeavor to do so.

Mr. DIBRELL. Among the cases you refer to of colonels, brigadiers, and major-generals placed upon the retired list, is there one who pleaded guilty to charges which led to his dismissal from the Army?

Mr. BROWNE. They have gone voluntarily out of the service to accept more remunerative employment in some cases. In other cases they have gone out of the service voluntarily on resignation, and are not in the service at all. We have reported (I do not say the gentleman from Tennessee has concurred in that action) in favor of putting them back into the Army again by putting them on the retired list.

Mr. DIBRELL. But you will never find my vote in the committee or elsewhere recorded in favor of one of them.

Mr. BROWNE. I will not say the gentleman from Tennessee has done anything so magnanimous. I acquit him of that.

Mr. LE FEVRE. This case was fully discussed in the committee. There was a fair majority in favor of reporting this bill. I will say, in justice to the minority, they opposed this case in the committee. I directed the making up of this report, and I was favorable to the relief sought for by Mr. Walker. I directed the gentleman who made this report to set forth all the charges that were made against Mr. Walker, and then give his official record as found in the War Department. I will say also that I did not write the report, but I did suggest all the points in it as there made, and I am responsible for this report as it stands.

There is very little of the report except the official record, which was easily obtained from the War Department, and which I directed to be placed in the report. I also, in view of the fact that there was a strong opposition to the case in the committee, had all the charges against Mr. Walker set out in the report. I think from my standpoint it is a fair one to both sides of the question. As for writing it in detail I did not, but I suggested all the points and examined the report after it was written, and indorsed it as my report, and so did the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. DIBRELL,] to strike out the enacting clause of this bill. The effect of that motion, if agreed to, will be that this bill will be reported to the House with an unfavorable recommendation.

Mr. PHILIPS. I would like to ask the gentleman who made this report a single question, so that I may be able to vote intelligently. As I understand it, this officer admitted the correctness of certain charges which were made against him, and the court-martial upon that admission found him guilty. I desire to ask whether any new facts have since been developed which were not brought before that court-martial?

Mr. LE FEVRE. I will state to the gentleman——

Mr. PHILIPS. I want to know whether the committee heard and determined the case simply upon the record as made up by the court-martial?

Mr. LE FEVRE. They did to a certain extent. They had before them the letter of the president of the court-martial.

Mr. PHILIPS. Did that letter develop any new facts which were not brought to the consideration of the court-martial?

Mr. LE FEVRE. You will find on page 5 of the report the letter of the president of the court-martial giving his opinion and impressions of the case.

Mr. PHILIPS. Does that letter contain anything more than the impressions of the president of the court-martial?

Mr. LE FEVRE. That is all.

Mr. PHILIPS. It contains no new facts?

Mr. LE FEVRE. None.

Mr. MILLS. I desire to ask gentlemen who have investigated this case if they have considered the question of the power of Congress to set aside the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, and to grant relief by restoring this officer to his former place in the Army? I remember that in the case of Fitz-John Porter, when it was under discussion in the Senate, a very able argument, as it appeared to my mind, was made by a Senator from Wisconsin, in which he took the ground that a court-martial was a court ordained and established by the Constitution, with competent jurisdiction to hear and determine such matters as arose in connection with officers of the Army, and that its judgment was conclusive and beyond the power of the Legislative Department of this Government to disturb. I am not satisfied that that position is not unanswerable. I think that before we are called upon to pass upon this question that matter ought at least to be deliberated upon by a committee of this House. That is one objection I have to acting upon this case now.

There is another objection. The object of establishing courts-martial in the Army is to enable the Army to preserve its discipline, and all officers of the Army know that discipline is an essential; that without it an army is a mob; its efficiency depends upon discipline. Now, if Congress is going to regard itself as a court of appeal to which all complaints may be brought from the judgment of courts of the Army, you will absolutely destroy the whole binding force of courts-martial in the Army, and thereby weaken if not destroy the discipline of the Army.

Mr. STEPHENS. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. MILLS. Certainly.

Mr. STEPHENS. I do not look upon this bill as at all undoing the judgment of a court. This House has no jurisdiction whatever over the decisions or judgments of courts of any kind. By the judgment of this court-martial, under the rules and articles of war and with the final approval of the President of the United States, this man was put out of the Army. We are asked only to restore him so far as to put him upon the retired list, not to put him back regularly into the Army. We do not undo the judgment of the court. Suppose that he was justly and properly dismissed the Army——

Mr. MILLS. Let me ask the gentleman this question?

Mr. STEPHENS. Certainly.

Mr. MILLS. Can this man go on the retired list without the action of Congress with that judgment of the court-martial on record?

Mr. STEPHENS. Without the action of Congress? No.

Mr. MILLS. Then of course to that extent we go behind the judgment of the court-martial.

Mr. STEPHENS. Not a bit. It is an appeal to this House which is within its competent authority and jurisdiction to grant. I was going to say that suppose this man was justly dismissed the Army and for an offense which we can excuse but which the court-martial could not. This case presents views other than were submitted to that court-martial. This report discloses the fact, established by surgeons' certificates again and again, that this man was diseased with rheumatism; and that at the very time he went on this undress parade he was suffering from an incipient violent attack of rheumatism. Moreover, this report shows that this man had taken, under the prescription of a physician, morphine for the disease with which he was suffering.

But I did not intend to go into any of the details of this case. I intended only to reply to the idea of the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. MILLS,] that we could do nothing for the relief of this man because of the judgment of that court-martial.

Mr. MILLS. As I have said, I am not perfectly satisfied that we cannot give this man relief; but I am very strongly inclined to the opinion that Congress has no right to interfere with and disturb the decisions of courts-martial in the Army, any more than it has the right to disturb the decisions of the civil courts of the country.

The Constitution of the United States has provided for courts-martial, and the judgments of those courts cannot be executed until the President of the United States—and there is your court of appeal—until the President of the United States has passed upon them and approved them. He is the highest executive officer in the land. He is the commander-in-chief of the Army, and it is proper that an appeal from the judgments of the courts-martial should be carried to him. He is as much charged with the duty of preserving the discipline and efficiency of the Army as he is with the duty of executing any law passed by Congress.

Now if we should establish the rule that Congress has the right to hear these appeals; that when a man has been tried according to the old English idea, confronted with the witnesses against him, provided with compulsory process to compel the attendance of his own witnesses, tried by his peers, his brother officers; when the whole case has been heard and judgment passed upon him; when he has appealed to the highest court to which he can go, to the President of the United States, the commander-in-chief of the Army, and the President has affirmed the judgment of the court below—if you establish the rule that you will nullify the whole judicial processes of the Army by which discipline can be enforced and efficiency among its officers maintained, you will destroy the whole efficiency and morale of the Army by making Congress one grand court of appeal to which every officer can come and call upon his friends in Congress to go behind and override and trample down the decisions of courts ordained by the Constitution for the purpose of preserving the discipline of the Army, and making it efficient for the purpose for which it was established.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a single word in order to explain the situation of this case. I think that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] has not studied this case, or he would not make here the point that he says was made by the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin in another notable case. There is no parallel between the two cases. In the case which was under discussion by the Senator from Wisconsin, there was a judgment of disqualification to hold office. In that case it was claimed (and I agree with the gentleman from Texas it was rightfully claimed) that Congress had no right to interfere with the execution of that judgment; that it could not be interfered with except through the pardoning power of the President. But here there is no disqualification. This man was simply dismissed from the service, and to-day under the law he is as eligible to appointment to a position in the Army as any other man out of the Army.

Mr. MILLS. The argument of the Senator from Wisconsin was not placed upon the ground that the gentleman states, but on the broad ground that there was a court ordained by the Constitution into whose judgments we could not inquire.

Mr. KEIFER. I agree (and that is the exact effect of what I said) that we are not to inquire into their judgments; and in passing this bill we do not do so. The court-martial dismissed this man from the service, but did not disqualify him from holding office, military or civil, in the future. He might have been reappointed, as others have been, the next day; and no law would have been violated. Here it is proposed simply to remove by operation of law a rule of law which prohibits appointments in the Army above a certain rank from civil life. That is the effect of this measure. We are not setting aside any sentence; we are simply setting aside for this particular case the law that now regulates the action of the President in the making of appointments and promotions in the Army. In thus providing for the retirement of this officer we are doing what we can very properly do by law. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. DIBRELL,] to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

Mr. BURROWS. Is it in order to strike out the enacting clause in committee and thereby kill the bill? Should not the motion be simply to report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that the enacting clause be struck out?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair stated that if the motion should prevail the effect would be to report the bill back to the House with an unfavorable recommendation.

Mr. KEIFER. And if the motion should be agreed to the Committee of the Whole would rise at once for the purpose of reporting the bill to the House.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. DIBRELL to strike out the enacting clause of the bill, it was not agreed to, there being ayes 26, noes 56.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now, Shall this bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House?

Mr. WRIGHT. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LE FEVRE,] who I believe has charge of this bill, whether before the court-martial this man was charged with having been intoxicated upon more than one occasion.

Mr. LE FEVRE. The charge applied only to this one occasion; and this was when he was on dress parade.

Mr. WRIGHT. Well, Mr. Chairman, if we go upon the principle of discharging a man from the military service because on a solitary occasion he has happened to be intoxicated, the effect might be that we would have no Army at all. [Laughter.] We have an illustrious example of a certain woman who had committed an offense, and who, when her accusers had disappeared, was told to go and sin no more.

Now, so far as the finding of this court-martial is concerned, I maintain that this Congress is a bigger court than any court-martial that was ever appointed in the Army for the purpose of investigating a charge against an individual. It may be true that in general the principle stare decisis should apply to the judgment of courts-martial; but in extreme cases, where there ought to be a remedy, and where the ordinary course of law does not furnish a remedy, then I think there is occasion for Congress to interfere and exercise its power. If this court-martial did wrong, as it undoubtedly did in dismissing this man for a single offense, then I maintain that Congress is justified, according to the laws of justice, reason, and humanity, in reversing the decision that was improperly made. In view of this principle and of the fact that there has been but a single offense charged, I shall vote to pass this bill, and to that extent overrule the judgment of the court-martial.

Mr. MAGINNIS. This officer was most unhappy, at least in the time of his court-martial. Others have been similarly tried, many others similarly sentenced, but few others have failed to escape the execution of such severe sentence. His case came before our gracious President in one of those fits of reform which have passed like spasms over the term of this administration—rarely lasting long, but severe while they lasted. When the President came to this capital with all the odor of Ohio sanctity about him, and all the virtuous ardor of the Sunday school and temperance society around him, there was a change presaged in the atmosphere of official life. The people believed that the new occupant of the White House would atone for the somewhat questionable methods by which he reached the presidential chair by such wise and patriotic reforms as would purify the political life of the people and improve both the civil and military service.

You will remember the civil service order, its grand promise and its weak performance; the professions with which it was put forth, the constant practice with which it was violated; beginning and ending with the appointment of all who had helped the Administration into place, either by participation in the election frauds of Florida and Louisiana or the scarcely more reputable defense of these methods before the electoral commission. The life has been crushed out of a well-meant movement in our politics by the hypocrisy of its professed friends, and the echo of the trumpet blast of civil-service reform with which the Administration heralded its advent comes back with mocking hilarity to laugh it out of office.

But there was one branch of the public service where no reforms were needed; where all that was desired was to maintain its ancient discipline and custom, in appointment, promotion, and discharge. The Army was beyond the reach of machine politics. But we were led to believe that even the morale of the Army was to be improved by these same beneficent influences. Temperance order No. 1 was also issued from the White House. The Army was warned that thereafter any officer who should be found guilty of being drunk on duty, or drunk under any circumstances, should be peremptorily dismissed. It was the misfortune of the officer whose case is being considered that the proceedings of the court which tried him reached the President immediately after this order was issued, and while he was filled with this virtuous and indignant ire against drunkenness. Hence this officer, with so much to excuse, was peremptorily dismissed. But, Mr. Chairman, as in the case of the civil-service spasm, this zeal for military reform soon passed away. The severe precedent has been rarely followed. This was about the only victim. One of the New York papers published the other day two or three columns of court-martial cases, where the sentence was mitigated or set aside. The officers have been similarly tried under similar charges, by similar courts-martial, and with much more aggravating circumstances; but as the proceedings did not reach Mr. Hayes while he was in the fever of reform the offenders saved their commissions, as in many instances was right. But surely all these mitigations and interferences and pardons were infinitely more powerful in breaking down the discipline of the Army than the passage of this bill would be.

But, Mr. Chairman, the discipline and morale of the Army have received worse blows than this. The rules of appointment and promotion have been settled for a long time in the military service of the United States. Advancement has been based on merit and length of service. Officers have not been compelled to turn themselves into place-hunters and to seek promotion by personal intrigue and political influence. The old soldierly way of relying upon the recommendations of their superiors, on their service, and on their merit was well adapted to secure zeal, intelligence, and devotion to duty. Surely if the evils of the civil service could not be reformed, the better methods of our military service might be maintained. But under the rules that have been adopted to fill vacancies in the Army all its old customs have been disregarded, the service filled with heart-burnings and complaints of favoritism, and our modest soldiers turned into a horde of applicants, seeking by personal and political means and unsoldierlike methods the advancement which is not assured to them in any other way.

Just look, Mr. Chairman, at the recent staff appointments. Overloaded and cumbersome as the staff is, with many officers retained more as a reward for past than a need of future services, one would think that all vacancies should be filled from two classes of men. Deserving officers on the frontier serving against the Indians, making such midwinter marches as were recently made against the Sioux, through deep snows and cold 40° below zero, or equally hard marches under the burning suns of summer, might well look forward to promotion to these pleasant and profitable staff appointments as a reward for their services in behalf of the flag. It had grown to be the policy of the Government to make such appointments; and when the Administration did go outside of the Army it was to reward some gallant and meritorious volunteer soldier who had served through the war without even the reward of a regular commission when it closed. Of such are hundreds of young men who learned the profession of arms only to lay it down; who have high business capacities and who are in every way worthy and deserving of these staff appointments when their tastes lead them to seek for them.

But recently, Mr. Chairman, we have seen civilians, the sons of politicians, the sons of personal friends, without any claim upon the Government, having never done anything in the service or for the Government, advanced over the heads of these meritorious officers, advanced over the heads of men who had made splendid records in the war, and appointed to these life positions which captains and lieutenants of twenty years' standing covet with longing hearts.

You have recently seen orders retiring certain officers of the Army. Were those retirements made from the oldest and most enfeebled officers, as the very law and principle of retirement contemplates? Were they made with due regard for all the rights of gallant men whose records are the glory of their country? Or were they made with a view to finding places for the rewards of favorites? It would seem, as a high officer of the Army said to me, as if the President would promise places to his friends, and then look over the Army Register to see who he could retire in order to make the desired vacancy—as purely personal in making a place as he was in filling it.

In order to make a vacancy among the brigadier-generals, one would think that General McDowell would have been selected for retirement. I have great respect for General McDowell, but the history of the country shows that he went into the war with greater advantages than any other officer and came out of it with less glory. In the very beginning of the struggle he was advanced to the front rank of command and intrusted with the most important enterprises. He was given greater opportunities than any other man, and yet, whether it was his fault or his misfortune, he was dropped by the wayside; and the close of the war found him without a command in the field. On the other hand, here was that tough, wiry, and grizzled old soldier, Ord, an officer who from the time he went into the Army had always been called on to perform the hardest service, and who had always performed it with success; who had no soft places around the headquarters of commanding generals or carpet service around the capital; who had made a most glorious record in the war; who in the final battles with the army of Virginia had marched his corps sixty miles on one forced march and stopped the retreat of Lee and compelled the surrender at Appomattox; whose claims for the highest positions were discussed at the close of the war; who then went to the western plains and was successful there, and was then sent to the Mexican frontier. You will remember the complications that threatened us with Mexico, and the outrages that were being committed on that border when he took command. The whole country was alarmed. But the wise and brave soldier honorably and successfully settled all these troubles, and his reward was his peremptory retirement, while General McDowell, his senior, was continued in active service with the rank of major-general. Ord was retired as brigadier, and would so have remained had not this Congress, by an act that will be a greater honor to Ord than would his regular promotion, given him the grade which he had so gallantly earned.

In the law corps of the Army, the Bureau of Military Justice, the senior officer has been retired, and one of the junior members jumped to the very front for personal reasons to the great injustice of his seniors.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I believe in the retirement of superannuated officers, especially chiefs of bureaus. The want of promotion causes great discontent in our service, but that stagnation should only be removed by beginning at the head and permitting officers to go up in their grade and order in accordance with military usages, and I have again to repeat that if there has been any injury to the discipline of the Army, it has not come from the acts of Congress, or the passage of bills like this under consideration, but from the violation of the rules and usages of promotion and appointment by this administration in its expiring days. It is personal and political favoritism which has disheartened and is demoralizing the Army of the United States.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. O'NEILL. I wish to give notice, Mr. Chairman, or rather I think that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LE FEVRE] gave notice two weeks ago that he would ask when we get into the House that Senate bill No. 2, which is now upon the Speaker's table and covering this same case, should be substituted for this bill.

Mr. DIBRELL. That requires unanimous consent, and I shall object.

FORT CHARTRES ISLAND.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 936) relinquishing the right of the United States to Fort Chartres Island.

The bill, which was read, provides that all the right, title, and interest of the United States in and to all that island or body of land situated in the Mississippi River opposite Fort Chartres Island, which said Fort Chartres Island is designated in the Government surveys as United States survey No. 737, claim No. 2107, in Randolph County, Illinois, and said island or body of land hereby conveyed is commonly known as "Bruce's Island," and may be further designated as being opposite the mouth of the Establishment Creek and lands adjacent on the Missouri shore, in Sainte Genevieve County, Missouri, and between said Establishment Creek's mouth and the adjacent lands in Missouri and said Fort Chartres Island, or United States survey No. 737, in Illinois, in the Mississippi River, shall be granted, relinquished, and conveyed by the United States in fee-simple and in full property to John R. Boas or his legal representatives; provided that nothing contained in the provisions of the act shall directly or indirectly comprehend, include, extend to, grant, relinquish, or convey the whole or any part of any lot, tract, piece, or parcel of land which has heretofore been granted by the United States.

The report, which was read, is as follows:

The Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 936) entitled "An act relinquishing the right of the United States to an island therein named," having had the same under consideration, beg leave respectfully to report:

The question of relinquishing said right was fully considered by the Committee on Private Land Claims in the Forty-fifth Congress, and a bill (H. R. No. 5439) relinquishing said right was reported unanimously by that committee at the third session thereof, but said bill was not reached upon the Calendar. The statements in the report accompanying said bill having been duly verified by your committee, with the letter of J. M. Armstrong, Acting Commissioner of the General Land Office, are set forth in the language of the former report, as follows:

"The evidence shows that this island lies in the middle of the Mississippi River, fifty miles below the city of Saint Louis, and is the product of gradual deposits by said river first forming a sand-bar, and thence increasing with every recurring flood for the past fifteen or twenty years. The river flows with equal volume and breadth on both sides. It is known as 'Bruce's Island,' from a half-crazy man of that name who built a house upon the island, and died and was buried there some years ago. Other attempts have been made to inhabit it, but the overflows have prevented its permanent occupation. Now the Government is asked to pass this act in the interests of peace and good order, and as a guarantee to neighboring proprietors against intrusions from river pirates, outlaws, and nondescript vagabonds who may make it their retreat and the abode of vice.

"It further appears that Mr. F. W. Brickey, who owns the entire Illinois shore opposite, where he has done business for the last thirty-five years, desires the passage of this act for the reasons stated, and has quitclaimed to Mr. John R. Boas, the grantee named in this bill, all right, title, or interest which he may have.

"Although Mr. Boas, it appears, owns a large part of the land opposite this island on the Missouri shore, and the party contiguous to him makes no claim, he would not have the proper standing in court to assert his rights against any intruder who claimed by virtue of possession, without such relief as the act herein contemplated would convey.

"While the grantee asks the Government to relinquish all of its interest in this island to him, it is his opinion that it really has none.

"In the case of Jones vs. Soulard, (24 Howard, United States Supreme Court Reports, pages 63-65,) the Supreme Court of the United States thought it a general rule, too well settled as part of the American and English law of real property to reopen to discussion, where a grant of land mentions the water line in general terms as the boundary line, that it confers the proprietorship on the grantee to the middle thread of the stream and entitles him to the accretions; and that the size of the stream makes no difference where it is above tide-water; to hold that it did would be a dangerous tampering with riparian rights, involving litigation concerning the size of rivers, as matters of fact, rather than proceeding upon established principles of law. Yet the opinion prevails with some that the title is in the United States. In fact, parties have undertaken to pre-empt it, but have been driven off by high water.

"Some of our ablest legal minds are of the opinion that the island is a bastard; that the United States having ceded all its proprietary rights to the States of Illinois and Missouri to the center of the Mississippi River, it has no title to lands formed within their boundaries since that time; that the State of Illinois has no rights. The same is true of Missouri; her supreme court has asserted in the case of Adams vs. the City of Saint Louis (32 Mo. Reports, page 25) that the State of Missouri by virtue of its sovereignty does not acquire title to lands that have formed in the Mississippi River since the legal existence of the State, and that it is not an accretion or formation attached to the shore, and cannot be claimed by the adjoining proprietors. The dilemma can be obviated only by uniting all possible claims in one. Hence this bill.

"The Commissioner of the General Land Office having reviewed this case in a communication to the chairman, dated January 10, 1879, attached hereto, concludes by saying that he "perceives no objection to the passage of this bill," and the committee unanimously recommend the passage thereof."

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., January 10, 1879.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 7th instant, inclosing House bill No. 5439, providing for the relinquishment to John R. Boas of the right, title, and interest of the United States to an island in the Mississippi River, opposite Fort Chartres Island, Illinois, and opposite the mouth of Establishment Creek and lands adjacent on the Missouri shore, the said island being commonly known as Bruce's Island. You also inclose a letter from Mr. Boas, dated Saint Louis, November 30, 1878, describing the island and stating his reasons for desiring to obtain control thereof, said letter being accompanied by a diagram showing the location of the island and by letters from Mr. F. W. Brickey, the owner of the lands on the Illinois shore opposite the island, showing that he has executed a quitclaim deed relinquishing his rights as riparian owner to Mr. Boas.

It appears upon examination that the said island is situated between township 5 south, range 10 west, third principal meridian, Illinois, and township 39 north, range 8 west, fifth principal meridian, Missouri.

To your request for the opinion of this office upon the merits of the bill, I have to state that inasmuch as the island has never been surveyed, and is not now surveyable under the regulations on account of being inarable, and as the bill provides that nothing contained therein shall directly or indirectly comprehend, include, grant, or relinquish any tract or parcel of land, in whole or in part, which has heretofore been granted by the United States, this office perceives no objection to the passage of the bill.

The papers inclosed in your letter are herewith returned.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. M. ARMSTRONG,
Acting Commissioner.

Hon. T. M. GUNTER,
Chairman Committee on Private Land Claims,

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. FANNY S. CONWAY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1583) for the relief of Mrs. Fanny S. Conway, of Louisville, Kentucky.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, directed to pay to Mrs. Fanny S. Conway, widow of Dr. Ed. Conway, lost in the Grampus in 1843, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $700, being the amount due and unpaid her under act of Congress.

The report is as follows:

That, having considered the same, they do recommend its passage.

In presenting this report they submit to the House the letter of the Fourth Auditor of the Treasury, that the House may know why the sum of money now sought by Mrs. Conway was withheld from her. It appears that the husband of Mrs. Conway, Dr. Ed. Conway, was an assistant surgeon in the United States Navy; that while on duty as such officer on board the United States vessel Grampus, said vessel with all on board was lost. It further appears that Congress in 1854 passed an act giving to the widows or heirs at law of such persons lost on board said vessel "twelve months' pay, in addition to the pay due to the said deceased at the date of the loss of the vessel."

Now, the accounting officers of the Treasury claim that inasmuch as the officer in question had given an order on his pay, known as an allotment order, for the benefit of his family and for their support during his absence at sea, and under which order $270 had been paid by the Treasury, they had a right to deduct this amount from the twelve months' pay granted by Congress, and did so.

Your committee do not agree to this construction of the act of 1854. To them it is apparent that Congress did not contemplate a settlement of accounts with the lost, but meant a gratuity or compensation to the living, in consideration of their loss or deprivation. In the service of the Government their stay and support had been taken away from them, and, recognizing this, a just, liberal, and beneficent Government intended to make them some compensation, and that compensation was twelve months' pay in addition to what was due the deceased, be that little or much; and so believing, your committee recommend the passage of the bill, which gives the widow the amount so deducted by the accounting officers of the Treasury.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, FOURTH AUDITOR'S OFFICE,
January 20, 1880.

SIR: The papers in the case of Mrs. Fanny S. Conway, widow of Edwin H. Conway, deceased, late assistant surgeon of the United States ship Grampus, transmitted with your letter of the 18th instant, are herewith respectfully returned.

In reply to your inquiry, I have the honor to state that Assistant Surgeon Conway, before sailing in the Grampus, granted an allotment in favor of a James T. Harrison, and upon that allotment the sum of $270 was paid in excess of the amount charged against his pay. It appears that in the settlement of Mrs. Conway's claim for the gratuity of twelve months' pay authorized by the act of July 27, 1854, the overpayment on the allotment was deducted from the gratuity, in conformity with the uniform practice of the accounting officers in such cases.

An allotment of any portion of an officer's pay at that time was, by the express regulations of the Navy Department, restricted to his family, and it was accordingly assumed that in this instance the allotment, although registered in favor of Mr. Harrison, was intended for the benefit of Mrs. Conway, and from the fact that she speaks in her letter to Hon. Mr. Willis of the allotment as left to her, it is highly probable that the accounting officers were correct in assuming that she received the $270; and if such were the fact it was properly deducted from the gratuity.

It can readily be seen that the family of an officer who had granted an allotment upon which hundreds of dollars may have been received after his death, and before his loss became known, would have a decided pecuniary advantage over the family of an officer lost by the same calamity who had given no allotment, if the overpayment already made by the Government should not be deducted. It is evident that Congress intended the pay of the officer to be considered in connection with the gratuity for the grant of twelve months' pay to the families of those lost in the Somers, (9 Stat. at Large, 332,) Washington, (10 Stat. at Large, 748,) and Grampus, (10 Stat. at Large, 799,) was "in addition to the pay due the said deceased" at the date of the loss of the vessel.

The above, as far as I can judge, appear to be the principal reasons why the accounting officers declined to allow Mrs. Conway's claim for the full amount of the gratuity.

I am, sir, respectfully, your obedient servant,

WM. B. MOORE,
Acting Auditor.

Hon. W. C. WHITTHORNE,
House of Representatives.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

MRS. ELIZABETH P. PAGE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1902) for the relief of Mrs. Elizabeth P. Page.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Mrs. Elizabeth P. Page, widow of the late Captain Hugh N. Page, the sum of $136.85, being the balance of pay due the said Hugh N. Page as captain in the United States Navy: Provided, Said payment shall not be made until the said Elizabeth P. Page files with the Secretary of the Treasury copies of her letters of administration, showing that she is the lawful representative of the said Hugh N. Page.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I move that the reading of the report be dispensed with.

Mr. WHITE and Mr. BREWER objected.

The report is as follows:

At the date of the resignation of the said Captain Page, who was a captain in the United States Navy, there was due him as such a small balance of $136.85.

The record of Captain Page in the Navy was a brilliant and honorable one. He entered the Navy in 1811, and during the memorable engagement on Lake Erie on the 10th day of September, 1813, he was attached as a midshipman to the squadron of Commodore Perry. He exhibited such coolness and intrepidity on the occasion referred to that the Congress of the United States voted him a sword in recognition of his gallant and efficient services.

When the State of Virginia passed her ordinance of secession Captain Page tendered his resignation as an officer in the Navy, which was accepted by the Secretary. At that time there was due him a small balance of $136.85, which your committee thinks should now be paid to his widow.

By the act of March, 1867, it became unlawful for the Treasurer of the United States to pay to Captain Page the amount due him, as he had, by serving in the confederate navy, "encouraged and sustained the late rebellion."

That law provided that no such payment should be made until otherwise ordered.

Your committee are of the opinion that Congress should now "otherwise order," and allow the widow to receive the money fairly earned by her late husband while honorably and faithfully serving the Government. They therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

Mr. BREWER. Mr. Chairman, I desire that the minority report be also read.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the minority report will be read.

There was no objection.

The minority report is as follows:

Hugh N. Page, the husband of the claimant, was appointed a midshipman in the Navy in 1811, and was promoted to a captaincy, and served faithfully until on the 10th day of April, 1861, when he wrote to the Navy Department, stating that as his native State, Virginia, had withdrawn from the Union, he therefore tendered his resignation as a captain in the Navy. On the 14th of May, 1861, his resignation was accepted. At the time of his resignation there was a balance due him of $136.85, and the bill in question is presented by the widow of the late Captain Hugh N. Page, who is now deceased, to recover the balance due her said husband. If these were all the facts to be considered, there could be no question but what the claim should be paid, and the same would undoubtedly have been paid at any time upon presentation at the office of the Fourth Auditor of the Treasury; but there are other important facts to be considered. Soon after Page's resignation, he entered the confederate service, and, without doubt, served thereafter the enemy of the United States in its efforts to destroy the Government as faithfully as he had served his own country for many years before. Whether Captain Page died while trying to destroy the Government of the United States, the minority of the committee is unable to state. In 1867 Congress passed the following act in the form of a joint resolution, and the same stands as section 3480 of the Revised Statutes:

"It shall be unlawful for any officer to pay any account, claim, or demand against the United States which accrued or existed prior to the 13th day of April, 1861, in favor of any person who promoted, encouraged, or in any manner sustained the late rebellion, or in favor of any person who during such rebellion was not known to be opposed thereto, and distinctly in favor of its suppression, and no pardon heretofore granted, or hereafter to be granted, shall authorize the payment of such account, claim, or demand, until this section is modified or repealed. But this section shall not be construed to prohibit the payment of claims founded upon contracts made by any of the Departments where such claims were assigned, or contracted to be assigned, prior to the 1st day of April, 1861, to the creditors of such contractors, loyal citizens of loyal States, in payment of debts incurred prior to the 1st day of March, 1861."

This act was passed, as we learn from the discussion which took place during its consideration in the Senate, for the very purpose of preventing the payment of just such claims as the one in question The joint resolution was presented in the House by Mr. Delano, of Ohio, on December 20, 1866; and, by unanimous consent, immediately put upon its passage, and passed without opposition. It went to the Senate, and was referred to the Judiciary Committee, and soon reported back to the Senate by Hon. Lyman Trumbull, chairman of the committee, and it passed the Senate February 2, 1867, with slight amendments, but without opposition, or even the calling of the yeas and nays. Congress, by this act, attempted to draw a broad distinction in the payment of claims between those who had been loyal to the Government and those who had been disloyal, and the law-making power only enacted that which the people with nearly one voice demanded. Take the case in question. Captain Page for many years served his country, but he was well paid for his patriotism and service. He had been promoted from time to time until he became a captain, which at that time was the highest rank known in the naval service; but in an evil moment he withdrew his allegiance from his Government and struck down the flag of his country with the sword which his country had presented to him.

The enactment of said law was to punish a class of men of which Captain Page was one. If the law was wrong when enacted it is wrong now and should be repealed; but if it was right when enacted, then it is no less right now and should be maintained. True, the claim in this case is but for a small amount, but the principle is as important as if the claim was for a million of dollars. The minority of the committee, believing the law was right when enacted and right now, is opposed to its repeal in whole or in part. If this bill should become a law it changes the principles enacted in the law of 1867. Undoubtedly there are thousands of similar claims against the Government, held by those who left the military or naval service of the United States and went into rebellion, and there is no reason for making the claim in question an exceptional case. If it is allowed and paid, then all other claims covered by the statute should be paid also and the statute itself repealed. The effort to pass this bill, in the opinion of the minority of the committee, is an attempt to do in parts that which the sentiment of the House and country will not permit to be done as a whole. Being opposed to the repeal of the act in question, so we are opposed to the payment of any claim the payment of which was prohibited by the act itself. We therefore respectfully recommend that the bill do not pass.

M. S. BREWER.
J. F. BRIGGS.

Mr. BREWER. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to take any great length of time in discussing the question involved in this case. It is simply this, that the husband of the claimant in 1811 entered the naval service of the United States. He served as a faithful officer until 1861 when the State of Virginia withdrew her allegiance from the General Government. He sent in his resignation setting forth those facts to the Secretary of the Navy. The resignation was accepted soon after. After the resignation had been forwarded to the Secretary of the Navy he immediately entered the confederate service. How long he served in the confederate navy I am unable to state. Whether he was killed in the service of the confederacy or not I am wholly unable to state. But we find that he died at some time afterward and that the widow now comes to Congress and presents her bill asking that the sum due him when he sent in his resignation to the Secretary of the Navy shall be paid. There is no question between the majority and the minority of the committee, but what there was due to Captain Page at the time he resigned, the sum of $136.85.

In 1867 Congress sought to cut off and prevent the payment of all such claims and passed an act which is set forth in the minority report. This act prohibited any department of the Government to pay any account, claim, or demand against the United States which accrued prior to the 13th day of April, 1861, in favor of any person who promoted, encouraged, or in any manner sustained the rebellion or who during such rebellion was not known to be opposed thereto and distinctly in favor of its suppression. It was introduced in the House and immediately put upon its passage without objection from any one. It went to the Senate and was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and was reported by the chairman thereof, Mr. Lyman Trumbull, then a Senator and chairman of that committee.

It was enacted for the very purpose of preventing the payment of claims such as this; and in order to show that fact I desire to call the attention of the committee to the discussion of the measure which took place in the Senate of the United States at the time it was pending before that body. After the committee had made its report and recommended at that time a slight change in the resolution as it passed the House by striking out of the bill the clause "or in favor of any person who during such rebellion was not known to be opposed thereto and distinctly in favor of its suppression," the chairman of the committee proposed to amend, and so stated to the Senate when he made his report, and in the discussion of that amendment Mr. Trumbull uses this language:

> As the resolution comes from the House, before the Government would be authorized to pay, it must appear affirmatively that the party asking the payment had been loyal and true to the Union.
> If those words are stricken out then the Government is prohibited to pay to any one who took part in the rebellion. The question is, whether it must appear affirmatively that the man was a loyal man before you can pay a claim which originated against the Government of the United States before the rebellion. There are cases, as I am informed, where parties had claims against the Government of the United States before the rebellion for services, perhaps in the Army, and subsequently joined the rebellion. The object of this resolution is to prevent the Government of the United States paying those parties and any of those claimants, although they may be pardoned now.

Mr. Hendricks, also a member of the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate, uses this language. He was in favor of the amendment proposed by the committee that made the report. He goes on to say:

> It is a little difficult to understand from the phraseology of this resolution what will be its effect. I recollect to have asked the Senator from Illinois, the chairman of the committee, when the committee was investigating it, what was the purpose of it. As I understood from him, the main object was to prevent the payment of any claims to military men for services prior to the war when the claimants themselves had gone into the rebellion.

Hence we say that the very object in passing this act was to cut out just such claims as this bill contemplates; and we find that this statement, as contained in that act, was approved by the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, as well as all of its members, and was so stated upon the floor of the Senate at that time by Mr. Hendricks, then a Senator of the United States and a member of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it may be stated by the gentleman who made the report—the majority report—that the time has come for ordering otherwise. These claims were not to be paid "until otherwise ordered," and the gentleman sets forth in his report that the time has now come, in the judgment of the committee, when it should be otherwise ordered.

I should like to know why it should be ordered now any more than at the time the act was passed that these claims should be paid. If it was right that these claims should be paid, then it was wrong to enact the law. If it was right they should not be paid, then it is no less right now.

Our friends who make this report may come and say this is but a small sum, $136.85. They may say that this lady who now presents this claim as the widow of Captain Page is poor and needy. They may seek to play upon the sympathies of this committee and of the House so as to secure the passage of this claim. I know how easy it is to raise a sympathetic feeling in the minds and hearts of members of this House. We saw it illustrated here in the passage of a bill which but a little while ago was before the committee. And it is the fact that claimants come here before the House and before the Committee of the Whole and present but one side of the case, and appeal to the sympathies and hearts of the members for relief.

Now, I say the widow of Captain Page could acquire no higher rights against the Government than those possessed by her late husband; and if it had been right to have paid this claim, then it should have been and would have been paid to Captain Page years ago, instead of its being claimed for the widow now. The same principles are involved upon this claim, and in this case, as would be involved if there was a million dollars concerned; no more and no less.

We are establishing a precedent to-day, and if we pass this bill then we ought immediately to repeal the act by which the payment of this claim and those of others like it is prevented. If this claim is right, which is presented by Mrs. Page, then I say there are a thousand others who have equally meritorious claims, and they should be paid as well as this widow. I insist we ought not to attempt to do here in part what we in my judgment in this Committee of the Whole, or in this House, will not do in whole, and what the country would not approve of our doing.

I apprehend that if any gentleman should come in here and ask that this law should be repealed which prevented the payment of any claims of those who went into rebellion against the Government, such a proposition would not receive the vote of one-third of the members of this committee. And yet we are asked to pay a claim which we are compelled, in order to pay, to repeal the act in question to the amount of this claim.

Since I have been a member of this House there have been many petitions presented here asking that amnesty might be granted to those who were serving the country in the Army or Navy and withdrew from that service and went into rebellion against their Government. We have been asked to grant amnesty to these men, and it has always been done; and when the question has been raised, as it frequently has been on this side of the House, that these parties were seeking to recover the amounts which might have been due to them at the time they withdrew their allegiance to the General Government we have been told by members upon this floor that they never would vote for any such bill. And now the question is presented fairly, squarely, and plainly before the committee. I wish that this might be made a precedent, such a one as will establish for all time to come whether this House desires to overthrow that act which was passed by the Congress of the United States in 1867, and which was passed at that time through the lower House of Congress without an opposition vote, and which was passed by the Senate without the calling even of the yeas and nays upon the vote. The justice of the act at that time was recognized by all. Is it any more unjust now than it was in 1867? I apprehend not. The Congress of the United States at that time sought to draw the broad distinction between the men who remained loyal to the Government and the men who became disloyal to the Government. Are we ready to-day to break down that distinction which was made by the passage of that act? If we are, then let us pass this bill. If we are not, then let us sustain the law that was enacted in 1867.

Mr. GOODE. Mr. Chairman, I regret that the gentleman from Michighan [Mr. BREWER] seems disposed to make such strenuous opposition to this little bill. What is it? If I can get the attention of the committee for a moment, I am sure that gentlemen on both sides of the Chamber will agree with the majority of the Committee on Naval Affairs that the bill ought to be favorably considered.

And I want to say, Mr. Chairman, for the information of gentlemen on the other side of the House surrounding the gentleman from Michigan who has just spoken, that this is a unanimous report from the Committee on Naval Affairs, with two exceptions. The bill was very carefully considered in the Committee on Naval Affairs, and that committee, with two exceptions, have reported it back with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman permit me one word?

Mr. GOODE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRIGGS. Does the gentleman mean to say that all the committee were present, at the time this bill was considered, and voted on?

Mr. GOODE. I think I am warranted in saying that if the members were not all present, every member of the committee, with two exceptions, advocated the passage of this bill. I wish the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HARRIS] were here to-day. I wish the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HARMER] were in his seat. But I feel warranted in the declaration that, with the exception of two members, the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIGGS] and the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. BREWER,] this bill has met the favorable consideration of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

It appears from the report that Captain Hugh N. Page entered the United States Navy as a midshipman in 1811. He was present at the battle of Lake Erie under Commodore Perry, and exhibited such conspicuous gallantry on that occasion that the Government voted him a sword. He remained in the service of the United States until the breaking out of the civil war in 1861, when he tendered his resignation for the reason stated by him, because his native State had adopted her ordinance of secession.

Now just here let me say that the report of the committee is slightly inaccurate. I do not attach any blame to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. BREWER.] He was misled by the report of the majority of the committee. Since that report was submitted I have been informed that it was slightly inaccurate in this: it says that Captain Page entered the service of the Confederate States. That is a mistake. He was too old a man to render any service, being seventy years of age when the war broke out. All he did was to tender his resignation in proper form as an officer of the Navy of the United States; which resignation was accepted by the Government.

I want to be frank with this committee; I want to do justice to all parties concerned. Therefore I say that I have no doubt if Captain Page had been of military age he would have entered the service of the Confederate States. He tendered his resignation in the Navy of the United States, but it is not true that he went into the confederate service, because, as I have said, of his extreme old age, he being at least seventy years of age at the time of his resignation.

Mr. HAWLEY. Did he state any grounds in his resignation?

Mr. GOODE. The only ground was that his native State of Virginia having adopted an ordinance of secession, he tendered his resignation as an officer of the United States Navy; that was his only reason.

It appears that at the time of that resignation, which was accepted by the Government of the United States, there was a small pittance of $136.85 standing to the credit of Hugh N. Page on the books of the Department. It is not disputed by gentlemen of the minority of the committee that this money was fairly and honorably earned by Captain Page. It is not disputed by anybody that the Government owed it to him at the time of his resignation, and owed it for faithful services rendered during a long and brilliant career. He died with this little pittance standing to his credit. His widow now comes, as his legal representative, and asks the Government to pay to her, as the representative of her late husband, what was legally due to him at the time of his death.

Gentlemen say it is a just claim; gentlemen say the amount is due; gentlemen say it has been fairly and honorably earned; but they are unwilling to pay it because of section 3480 of the Revised Statutes.

Now I submit to this Committee of the Whole that it was never contemplated by the Government of the United States to confiscate forever a claim like this. I apprehend the Government only intended to suspend for the time being the payment of such claims. Why? It was the period of reconstruction. The States had not yet been fully restored to the Union. Nobody knew then how many such claims might be preferred against the United States, and Congress in its wisdom, in 1867, thought that it would be good policy to suspend the payment of these claims until they should think proper to "order otherwise." They never intended to confiscate them. The Government never undertook to confiscate the property of any man who went into the rebellion.

I claim that this is as much a debt due to the estate of Captain Hugh N. Page as if he had held the bonds of the Government at the time he died. It was to his credit upon the books of the Department. He had earned it. He had rendered a quid pro quo, and it stood to his credit at the time of his resignation, and stands to his credit to-day on the books of the Treasury Department.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BREWER] says it shall not be paid. Why? Because section 3480 of the Revised Statutes provides that it cannot be paid until "otherwise ordered," until the section is modified or repealed. Was it ever designed by Congress to say that it should never be paid at all? Is not that practical confiscation? At the request of friends around me I will read the section:

> It shall be unlawful for any officer to pay any account, claim, or demand against the United States which accrued or existed prior to the 13th day of April, 1861, in favor of any person who promoted, encouraged, or in any manner sustained the late rebellion, or in favor of any person who during such rebellion was not known to be opposed thereto, and distinctly in favor of its suppression, and no pardon heretofore granted, or hereafter to be granted, shall authorize the payment of such account, claim, or demand, until this section is modified or repealed. But this section shall not be construed to prohibit the payment of claims founded upon contracts made by any of the Departments where such claims were assigned or contracted to be assigned prior to the 1st day of April, 1861, to the creditors of such contractors, loyal citizens of loyal States, in payment of debts incurred prior to the 1st day of March, 1861.

Now, I submit that the statute and the debate referred to by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. BREWER,] which occurred in the Senate in 1867, show that the whole purpose of the Government at that time was to suspend for the time being the payment of these claims until the States were fully restored to the Union and until these claims could properly be inquired into; in other words to suspend them temporarily until Congress in its wisdom should "order otherwise."

My friend from Michigan and my colleague on the Committee on Naval Affairs [Mr. BREWER] says that it was the purpose of Congress to punish men who had gone into the rebellion. I beg him to remember that the Government has never undertaken to confiscate the property of any rebel. And I submit to him and this committee that if the design was to punish, it was never intended by the Government to punish beyond the grave. Captain Page is dead, long since dead. If it was intended to punish him he has been punished by the withholding of the payment of his claim during his lifetime.

Was it intended to apply the doctrine to his widow, or to his legal representatives? Was it intended to punish them on account of his supposed disloyalty? What right had this Government to do any such thing? Can Congress pass a bill of attainder? Would it not be practically a bill of attainder if you should now say that, although this money was due to Captain Page at the time of his death for honorable and meritorious services to the Government, his widow and his estate should not have it because he was a rebel? I want to know whether such legislation is not to all intents and purposes a bill of attainder; whether you are not undertaking to pursue Captain Page beyond the grave and taint his blood because of disloyalty? Is not that the effect?

I did not intend to say anything on this bill. I supposed that the Committee of the Whole would vote on a little case like this without discussion; but I felt it proper to say this much, that members might understand exactly the point involved.

I repeat, here is a little sum of $136.85 due to the late Hugh N. Page. It is admitted on all hands that the money is in the Treasury to his credit; it is admitted that he earned it fairly; it is admitted that his record in the service is honorable and brilliant. The Government at one time voted him a sword. The fact is that when the war broke out he resigned, went home, and remained quietly there during the war, not being able to participate in the war on account of his extreme old age. His representative, his widow, comes now and asks that this money may be paid to her. There is nothing in the way but section 3480 of the Revised Statutes, which simply suspended the payment of this claim for the time being. I hold that this is as much a debt due from this Government to the estate of Hugh N. Page as if his widow held the bond of the Government. Gentlemen cannot escape from that proposition. This is a debt, an honest debt, due for services rendered; and my doctrine is that it is the part of wisdom and of policy for governments as well as individuals to pay their honest debts. I hope the Committee of the Whole will report the bill favorably.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Chairman, one after another of these old claims comes creeping into this House, stained all over with the record of their disloyalty. When they come they always have their advocates. The reasons given for passing this class of bills are always plausible. If it is a claim on behalf of a college; it is an "old college" that has educated great men, and the passage of the bill is demanded, and demanded by the gentleman from Virginia in favor of education. Year after year, day after day, William and Mary College is made the entering wedge; and gentlemen are rallied to the support of that bill by plausible arguments in favor of education, in favor of antiquity, in favor of "the first educational institution on the continent." No matter what the subject may be there are always plausible, eloquent, sympathetic reasons given for the passage of the bill. Generally there is great force added to the bill because it is a "little" thing. I think I have observed—and if I am mistaken in this the gentleman can correct me—I think as a general rule my friend from Virginia gathers all his intellectual forces around a "little" thing. Because it is small, because it is weak, because it is feeble, he comes to its rescue with a chivalry worthy of himself.

Now, what is this case? What does it present to you and to me and to this committee and to the American people? Sir, it is the history of an adopted son of this Republic placed in command above his fellows, commissioned to rule over other citizens in the Navy of the United States. As a gallant young man, on the broad waters of the lake which bounds my State, he won distinction with hundreds of other men. Was the country ungrateful for his services? Far back in that war of which Lake Erie was the scene, Congress rewarded the valor of this young man, presented him a sword; encouraged him from that time thenceforth and forever, while his hand had the power, to wield that splendid gift of his country given him in reward of allegiance, of fidelity, of valor—to wield it for the country which thus honored him, which thus glorified him, which thus told the world how the Republic would reward its faithful and devoted sons. Years passed on—a half century of honors, of promotion—until this man was elevated to the highest rank in the Navy which our laws recognize—honored, trusted, loved; and there came a time when in the madness of the hour, instigated by traitors, by rebels, that State of Virginia tore down the banner of the Union and proclaimed to her sons that she set up an independent government for herself. Virginia, not the most deserving by far, but the most honored of all the States in the American Union, was the first to lay an unholy hand upon the banner of the Union and strike at its life. And this son of Virginia, for fifty years the honored representative of that State in the Navy of the United States, engaged then in upholding the flag of his country, honored with the highest command which could be given to the son of any State, immediately upon hearing that the State to which he belonged had become dishonored—had become traitorous, had rebelled, had struck down the flag, had withdrawn from the association which had honored the State, not which the State had honored—resigns that high position, hands back to the Government with scorn and derision the honors conferred upon him, resigns his high commission, but carries off in his old trembling hand the sword which the nation had given him, carries it off to use it to strike the heart of the nation which gave it. [Laughter on the democratic side.] Ah! those gentlemen laugh and sneer; perhaps they did the same. [Laughter on the republican side.] I do not envy the smile that gathers upon the faces of some gentlemen on the other side of the House—the smile of their derision at the picture I have drawn. It is a becoming exhibition of the contortions of which the human face is capable under adverse circumstances. [Laughter.] It treats well of the wisdom and power of that Creator who can make a face subservient to the rule and will of the mind, which shall show a contrary feeling to that which exists within the breast sometimes. [Laughter.] Now, sir, that is the picture of this man.

The gentleman says he was too old to engage in the confederate service. He was not too old to resign and leave the service of his country. He was not too old to tell the officials of his Government that he did resign because his State was treacherous, because it was rebellious, and that he was hurrying to leave the service of his country that he might fling himself, old as he was, trembling as he was, paralyzed as he was, with his remaining vital forces into the arms of his treacherous and rebellious State, to aid it either by force of arms or by counsel and advice and encouragement.

Ay, sir, it is reported to have been said by a distinguished general in the service of the United States that the South had robbed the cradle and the grave to bring strength to their cause. Here was this man not yet in the grave. Here was this man who had gone to Virginia to aid Virginia in its treason. The law said to all such men and all officers of this Government, a law enacted and re-enacted: if you will thus, in the day of your country's emergency and danger, forsake your post of duty, there shall be no payment made to you for services either past or present. That law for twenty years almost has stood on the statute-book of the nation. That law for six years almost standing there has never been attacked by any man whose face now lights up with sneers at what I say. There is boldness among you, infinite boldness; but no man has had the courage to propose the repeal of that section. No man has dared to stand up before the American people and declare that law was improper or unnecessary or ought to be repealed. It remains to-day, sir, for the gentleman from Virginia——

Mr. GOODE. If the gentleman will allow me, I think he is in error in that statement. It is my recollection that repeated efforts have been made to repeal section 3480 of the Revised Statutes. Repeated efforts have been made in the other Chamber if they have not been made here, and there the question has been debated but postponed and defeated in various ways.

Mr. CONGER. If there is such an effort, it is of record. I ask the gentleman for the record. I never heard of it in this Chamber. I never heard any allusion to or request for the repeal of this law in this Chamber except the remark of a gentleman from Kentucky made, as it is said, inadvertently that when the democracy gained the control of this House, and the other end of the Capitol, and of the Presidency, there should be a repeal of all the reconstruction laws which, and which, &c.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Will the gentleman illustrate his usual fairness by refusing to garble and butcher a record that lesser lights of the republican party without credit to themselves have butchered before him?

Mr. CONGER. Does the gentleman deny the remark as far as I quoted it?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I deny——

Mr. CONGER, (interrupting.) Does the gentleman deny the remark as far as I have quoted it?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I do, and say the RECORD denies it for me.

Mr. CONGER. Then I turn to the RECORD.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Then read the whole sentence.

Mr. CONGER. Ah! as far as I quoted it. I said "repeal all of the reconstruction acts."

Mr. BLACKBURN. The word "reconstruction" is not in that speech.

Mr. CONGER. Well, "all war measures and which and which," as the gentleman inserted in the RECORD.

Mr. BLACKBURN. And which the gentleman is not fair enough to quote to the letter.

Mr. CONGER. "All war measures," "war legislation, which and which."

Mr. BLACKBURN. And the "which and which" which I dare you to tell. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman may tell "which and which," some of which we have heard and the rest we saw in the RECORD. But that, Mr. Chairman, is not what I am commenting upon.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Does the gentleman say that this speech was not published as delivered?

Mr. CONGER. I have nothing to say about that.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The gentleman seems to be willing to say things by implication which he seems to lack the recklessness to utter by direct assertion.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman's remarks are of record.

Mr. BLACKBURN. And when they are referred to upon the floor of the House I would accept it as evidence of fairness if he who makes the reference would quote the record.

Mr. CONGER. I simply say what I have stated. There are other remarks, too, which I have referred to repeatedly——

Mr. BLACKBURN. It does not suit your purpose to quote them.

Mr. CONGER. I do not quote them. The gentleman may quote them at his leisure.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The gentleman from Michigan might improve his speeches on the average if he would reproduce that one of mine. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman does not deny so much as I have quoted of the RECORD. He added to that whatever he chose. That is enough for me. That is enough for my purpose, and that is collateral to what I am saying. The gentleman is not figuring in this discussion, I would have him to understand. The gentleman from Virginia was occupying my attention when he chose to interrupt.

Mr. BLACKBURN. If the gentleman from Michigan will allow me, in justice to himself and to me, I do enter a protest against his purpose of making a garbled quotation, or doing injustice to anybody, however obscure the individual.

Mr. CONGER. I will now read, as I understand, what the gentleman has said.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Will the gentleman read a full sentence, and not a portion of one?

Mr. CONGER. I will read two sentences; I will double on the gentleman.

Mr. BLACKBURN. What book does the gentleman read from; the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD?

Mr. CONGER. I read from a document you will not dispute.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I ask that the gentleman read from the official record of the House.

Mr. CONGER. I have stated that I will read the language of the gentleman, and he will not deny it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Will the gentleman answer the question? Does he read from the official record of this House, or from a republican campaign book?

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman can deny what I read if it misrepresents his statement.

For the first time in eighteen years past—

I am quoting now what I understand was said by the gentleman from Kentucky.

For the first time in eighteen years past the democracy are back in power in both branches of this Legislature, and she proposes to signalize her return to power, she proposes to celebrate her recovery of her long-lost heritage, by tearing off these degrading badges of servitude and destroying all the machinery of a corrupt and partisan legislation.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I ask what document the gentleman is reading from.

Mr. CONGER. That is one sentence.

We do not intend to stop until we have stricken the last vestige of your war measures from the statute-book.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Is that the end of a sentence? I ask the gentleman to read a little farther.

Mr. CONGER. Up to that point I quoted, and then said: and which and which and which. [Laughter on the republican side.]

Mr. BLACKBURN. What was the "which" the gentleman refers to? I desire the gentleman from Michigan to answer either one of two questions: has he stopped at a semicolon or has he read to the end of the sentence? and has he read from the official records of this Congress? I dare the gentleman to read on.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Chairman, this daring matter may have some influence and may be important among school-boys of a tender age, but not among gentlemen. [Laughter on the republican side.]

Mr. BLACKBURN. I only dared the gentleman to do right. I thought it included tender judgment as well as tender age.

Mr. CONGER. Now, sir, I will read again. I read that part of the sentence to which I have already referred, and then went on saying, "and which and which and which."

Mr. BLACKBURN. And I did most emphatically deny that that was the end of the sentence, and asked the gentleman to continue.

Mr. CONGER. Cannot the gentleman contain himself until I finish.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Let me say to the gentleman from Michigan that I appreciate the fact that is well known to everybody in this House, that of all men he is the only one that never finishes. [Laughter on the democratic side.]

Mr. CONGER. Now, I will read. I have finished the gentleman from Kentucky. [Laughter.] I am finishing him off.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I doubt not the gentleman has probably tired of it by this time.

Mr. CONGER. "We do not intend to stop"—and I do not intend to stop either. [Laughter on the republican side.] "We do not intend to stop until we have stricken the last vestige of your war measures from the statute-books, which, like these, were born of the passions incident to civil strife, and looked to the abridgement of the liberty of the citizen."

Mr. BLACKBURN. I say that now. I say it again.

Mr. CONGER. And which and which, as I said before. [Laughter on the republican side.] But the gentleman himself was so anxious that I should embody in my remarks something which he has said and have it go out in my speech that he has continued to interrupt me after I had already quoted him, and keeps me reading on and reading on. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLACKBURN. I knew it would improve the gentleman's speech.

Mr. CONGER. And there, with his usual magnanimity, he says, I "never finish." Now, I dismiss the gentleman from Kentucky, if he is willing. I was discoursing somewhat upon the comment of a more distinguished gentleman, if I may be permitted to say so, or be allowed to pay that high compliment to my friend from Virginia. I allude to my friend from Virginia who critcises this report, a distinguished gentleman from a more distinguished State, as the honorable chairman will permit me to say in his presence. [Laughter.]

I was saying, sir, if I can recollect so far back as the time when the gentleman from Kentucky came to my assistance, that a distinguished general of the Union forces had declared that the confederacy—and I am very sure that without being personal I may say that there are persons here who will remember what I now repeat, and know whether that remark is true or not; if so, I call upon them to dispute or deny it—this gentleman has said that they were robbing the cradle and the grave to fill up their armies. And here is a living man, though only seventy years of age, quite a young man compared with some venerable gentlemen upon this floor whose actions point to great activity and greater age. He was in the service. The report of the committee declares that he entered the confederate service, and I won't deny that statement, but will criticise it, I must confess, with a great deal of reluctance lest it will be taken advantage of by the fiery gentlemen on the other side of me as attempting to discredit the report of the committee. Now, however, the gentleman from Virginia permits himself, after the report has been read, to stand up and say that the report is not true; that the report is false; that when it says this gentleman entered the confederate service it states what is not true. Who made that report? What gentleman of that committee is responsible for imposing upon this committee and upon the country a false report that can be contradicted here with a breath?

Mr. GOODE. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. CONGER. I yield.

Mr. GOODE. I am the author of that report, and I am responsible for it.

Mr. CONGER. Here? [Laughter.]

Mr. GOODE. Wait a moment. I deem it due to candor and fair play to say to the House, that since the report was prepared and submitted it came to my knowledge that in that particular it is inaccurate. The report stated that he entered the confederate service. I have learned since that he did not enter the confederate service. But in fairness and in candor I state at the same time my belief to be that he only was prevented from doing so by extreme old age. I do not want to mislead the committee, and I would not do injustice to the memory of the dead. I think Hugh N. Page, if alive, would not thank me for representing to the American Congress that he was not willing to go with his native State into a struggle like that.

Mr. CONGER. Ah, sir, if a man has to apologize for not having entered the confederate service there are few on that side from the South but would escape the necessity, although my friend is not one of them. They do not need the apology of age or anything else that they did not enter the confederate service.

But, sir, the report of the committee was read, the minority report was read, and comments were made upon the case; and it was not until the bill was opposed that my friend from Virginia saw fit to correct the report of which he stated he was the author. That is not material. To this question it is immaterial whether this veteran officer of our Navy entered the confederate service or not. He publicly declared to his native land and to the officers thereof that he resigned his commission and left the service because his State had become traitorous to the Government, and he wanted to go with his native State. What he did, how he worked, how he fought, how he labored, or what prevented it is immaterial. With me the point is that, bearing in his hand the sword presented to him by a nation for his gallant services, he went into the heart of treason, gave his influence to the cause of treachery, and bore his sword to attack his native land, to strike down its banners, to destroy its Government.

Sir, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GOODE] has told this committee that he would not do so much injustice to the memory of a once gallant officer of the United States as to say here before us that he would not have entered the confederate service if he had not been prevented by age and infirmity. I will do the justice to the boy that fought on the waters of Lake Erie. I will do the justice to one who bore our flag on all the oceans of the world and before all countries, an honored, loved, and respected man until he fell, in that fatal hour when the whole country was filled with political graves, and he fell into one of those graves to be dishonored forever. I will do him the justice to say that I believe if that man were alive now the recollection of his associations with his beloved land, of the honors once conferred on him, of the flag which he bore, of the country he fought for, of the patriotism of which he had been so bright an example, of all the long years of his life up to that moment, would have prevented him from ever coming here and asking for the pitiful sum of $200, for the sake of which the salutary law enacted by one Congress, reaffirmed by another, untouched during all these twenty years, should be repealed in his behalf. No, sir, in his heart to the hour of his death there was the consciousness of his association with a great, and grand, and glorious, and growing republic; and if it did not hasten the hour of his death that he had in the fatal moment proved false and treacherous to the flag he bore, to the nation which had honored him, I can at least conceive he went down to his grave surrounded by sad memories of reproaches continually sounding in his ear until the death-knell shut off all perception of earthly things.

No, sir, the American people do not wish that law repealed. If that side of the House desire for any purpose, and so inconsiderable a one as this, to be on record for the repeal of the law which no hand has dared to touch for twenty years, I invite them to the issue. It seems to me as if the infinite variety of blunders of the democracy would insure their ruin without any effort from our side of the House; and I say let them put their votes on record, even in this case, which is an entering-wedge for thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars to be taken out of the Treasury to pay up for the rebellion which is past.

Mr. HOUSE. It seems to me that this discussion has taken a very wide range and aside from the merits of the case now before this committee. To what the gentleman from Michigan has seen fit to say on this occasion in reference to the South and in reference to this side of the House I care not to reply. It is not the first time that that gentleman has bawled himself hoarse in that case. It is not the first time the bloody shirt has been invoked by that gentleman to cover the cause of injustice.

What is the case before this committee? It is the case of an aged widow asking—for what? For the pitiful sum of $136 which this Government owed to her dead husband—owed before there was any war of the rebellion—for services that he had rendered his country. Nobody disputes that. She is the widow of a man who had reflected honor upon his country's flag in the past. This claim is for services he then rendered.

Does the Government owe him that money or not? Does anybody dispute that the Government owes it? Suppose, Mr. Chairman, that I owed you the sum of $130, and you and I were afterward to have a dispute or a falling out, and in order to punish you I repudiated the debt and refused to pay it. Between individuals such conduct would be infamous. Shall the Government place itself in that position toward this old widow?

This Government has never attempted to confiscate this debt. If it had been confiscated, confiscation could not have lasted beyond the life of this officer; his heirs would have been entitled to it. Whatever may have been his faults, or whatever in the estimation of gentlemen may have been his crimes, he has passed beyond the praise or the censure, the reward or the punishment of the House.

His aged widow is now here asking for the payment of the sum of $130 which the Government owed her husband for services he had rendered. That is the question. This House can refuse to pay this claim. The claim is seized upon by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] as an occasion for delivering to this side of the House a lecture, and to vent what seems to be his inexhaustible spleen against the South and the cause of the South upon this side of the House, which has southern Representatives. This claim is made the occasion of the long speech which he has delivered here—the claim of the old widow of an officer who reflected credit upon his country; the widow now coming here and asking the Government to pay the small debt that it owed to her dead husband.

It does seem to me that there could not be a more meritorious claim presented to Congress than the claim of this old widow. I have nothing more to say about it.

Mr. BRIGGS. I signed this minority report, and signed it for the purpose of bringing this question directly before this House. There is not any question as to the military history of this man. There is not any question as to what services he rendered the United States down to the time that Virginia seceded from the Union. There is no controversy about those facts.

And I do not think there is any dispute about another fact, that the Government did owe him the sum stated in this report for services rendered prior to the time of his resignation. Now, why is it that that debt has not been paid? Because of the fact that you have a statute or the section of a statute which forbids the payment of this claim and all claims of like character.

Mr. BEALE. Just at this point let me inquire of the gentleman if the section to which he refers forbids the payment of such claims as this to the heirs of the party? Does it not confine its operation to the parties themselves?

Mr. BRIGGS. The statute has been read here a half dozen times to-day; and it is embodied in this report, and the gentleman can construe it as well as myself.

I say there stands the statute. If it is not a bar to the payment of this claim, why is this bill here? Why does not the party go directly to the proper authorities and collect the amount of the claim? I suppose the majority of the Committee on Naval Affairs believe that that section of the statute is a bar to the payment of this claim and of all claims of a similar character.

If that statute is wrong, then let gentlemen bring in a bill to repeal it, and not seek to fritter it away and destroy its effect and influence by piecemeal as they are doing in this case. When I signed that report I desired to bring this question directly before this House. Is section 3480 of the Revised Statutes wrong? If wrong it should be repealed. If it is right its principles should be adhered to.

It is said this is a small claim. It is a small claim. It is said also that this widow woman is old and poor. I presume that may be so. It is a case which appeals to the sympathy of every individual who understands its merits. But it is just one of those cases which are always selected as an initiative step; which are always selected as the most suitable and proper for establishing precedents that may be followed hereafter. I say to gentlemen, come up and act upon this measure like men. If that law is wrong, repeal it. If it is not wrong, then stand by it and refuse to pass this bill which would be a practical repeal of it.

Mr. WILSON. Will the gentleman allow me to make one suggestion?

Mr. BRIGGS. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON. Is this House bound by the provisions of that law? Is it not perfectly competent for this House to grant the relief asked for?

Mr. BRIGGS. That is what I say; that when you pass this bill you practically suspend the operation of that law.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The Committee of the Whole rose informally, and Mr. HUTCHINS took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate requested the return by the House of a bill of the following title:

A bill (H. R. No. 2180) to increase the pension to James H. Reeve.

MRS. ELIZABETH P. PAGE.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session, and proceeded with the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1902) for the relief of Mrs. Elizabeth P. Page.

Mr. COX addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. CHITTENDEN. Mr. Chairman, I am sincerely sorry that my colleague should suspect me of any unpleasantness toward him. I am one of his early and true friends, and he ought to know it. I believe in six years and a half I have not been tempted to utter a word in this place indicating any sense of hate toward any one. In all the accidents of debate, I am sure there cannot be found a syllable of hatred in anything I have ever said. And I certainly have not risen at this time to say anything of that sort. I am myself a widow's son, and a widow's name seeking justice is never mentioned in my hearing without touching the most sensitive part of my nature. If there be an act upon the statute-book of the United States which prevents the payment of these $130 honestly due to the widow of a once faithful naval officer of the United States, it seems to me that act should be repealed or modified.

I know a little historic incident connected with the outbreak of the rebellion which has some pertinency and a lesson for my friend from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.] I knew a merchant in New York who sat by the side of an old commercial correspondent as the wires were about to tick that Virginia had seceded from the Union. The Virginian said, "What shall I do if my State secedes?" The merchant said, "If you have purchased your goods, take them and do the best you can; no man who knows you will refuse to deliver them even after Virginia has seceded." Within half an hour the news came that Virginia had seceded. The Virginian then said to the merchant, "You of course will not trust me now." The merchant said to him, "You purchased the goods fairly on yesterday. I will send them and I will take all the risks. I have known you for ten years and know that you will pay for them if you can; let the consequences be what they may, every dollar of the merchandise shall go if you want it." It did go.

Five years after the war was over, or perhaps three, this merchant of Richmond, Virginia, Breeden by name, a thorough rebel who gave his all for the success of the confederate cause, returned to the merchant in New York and paid for the goods, every dollar, principal and interest.

Now, it seems to me that if there be a widow asking for $130 honestly due her husband who was an officer of the United States Navy, a debt for services which preceded the rebellion—if this Congress refuses to pay the debt, they, in my judgment, do an act which appeals to the manhood outside of Congress to see that another Congress shall find a way to pay it with double interest. [Applause on the democratic side.]

Mr. BRAGG. Mr. Chairman, I regret, sir, that upon a bill of this kind the debate should have taken so wide a range as it has taken here to-day. I have been charmed by the beauties of my friend from New York, [Mr. COX.] But I regard this question as involving one of principle; and I am not to be driven from the views I entertain upon a question of such a character by any glittering generalities, supported by poetry and all the beauties and flowers of rhetoric.

I remember well the history of a gentleman in the old army who earned for himself a reputation second to none as a great and brave officer as he led his forces through the snows and stood before the walls of Quebec. If his record were to be discussed here now, are we to be driven from the consideration of the fact as to where he ended by the brilliancy of his career in the outset? The same line of argument that was taken by the gentleman from New York might equally well be applied to him. Arnold fought nobly, bravely, and well; but Arnold deserted the flag of his country in a trying hour of its need.

It may be said that the beneficiary under this bill was the wife of a hero of Lake Erie. Well and good. Far better for him had he died sustaining the flag of his country in the glorious battle upon Lake Erie than to have died having in his latter years, when too old to do service in the line of his duty, spat upon that flag by tendering the resignation of his commission in the hour of his country's greatest peril. [Applause on the republican side.]

This is a question, Mr. Chairman, in my judgment, which is, as I have said, a question involving a principle. It is a bill which involves, it is true, a very trifling amount.

It was not the stamp tax that brought on the Revolution. It is the principle involved and underlying this thing. Shall we wipe out all legislation which prevents men once in the service of the United States and who abandoned their duties from coming back again as claimants upon the public Treasury, because, forsooth, the leader of the claimants is a lady, old and gray, whose husband, in his youthful days, did serve his country with honor and distinction? If we do away with the principle here, where shall we end? If we pay this woman because she is old, if we pay her because she is needy, that is one thing. But if we pay her because she was the wife of an officer who resigned and under whose resignation there comes up this bill and penalty which deprived him of his pay, he having placed himself in the position of suffering the penalty, that is another thing.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. Was there any such law in existence at that time; any law that would deprive him of his pay?

Mr. BRAGG. There was this law, and it is recognized everywhere, that he who deserts his country's flag in the hour of his country's peril is entitled to no respect from that country afterward, except such as she gives him by a mere generosity and as a gratuity.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. If there was no such law, then there is a constitutional right.

Mr. BRAGG. Mr. Chairman, I am not here to discuss the Constitution. If I were, I should say that the gentlemen who broke the Constitution and fled from it are not the men to hold it before me and ask me to support it. [Applause on the republican side.]

If this bill pass there is no man who was in the American service, whether civil, military, or naval, but will come back to the Treasury of the United States for something which may have been due him for some few days before he deserted his country.

I am anxious, Mr. Chairman, as anxious as any man in this House, never to see again or hear of the subject of the southern rebellion. It strikes me as deeply and keenly as any man upon the floor of this House, and I would fain wipe it out forever from sight and memory. But I say to my friends from the South, that when you want to end this controversy, when you want to close up these memories, it is no proper way to do it by bringing forward claims here and presenting them for consideration which keep alive those memories by constantly stirring up something that involves the discussion of the rebellion and the troubles which have grown out of it.

The difficulty lies precisely there. It is in vain to ask the people of the North to close their eyes when their ears listen continually to the rapping at the Treasury door and asking for what is due, involving a discussion of all that preceded and all that took place during the war. I say, let the rebellion sleep where it does sleep; let the tree lie where it fell, and do not longer present before this House these irritating subjects for discussion.

Mr. HAWLEY. I have but a few words to say. Much that I would have said has been anticipated by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. BRAGG,] to whom I personally tender my thanks for what he has uttered.

If I were asked whether I were willing, in behalf of a venerable lady, the widow of a deceased officer who had done service to the country in years gone by, to waive any technical point of law on her behalf, I should have little to say. If I were asked to remedy the asperities and harshness of a general law by giving my little subscription to pay the sum claimed as due to this lady, I should have nothing to do except to make and pay my subscription. But when a gentleman presents a bill of this description, and says to me, vehemently, that it is as good a debt as any represented by any Government bond, and when he says to me that nothing in the world has been done to forfeit any obligation this Government was under, he revives issues and revives sentiments that I desire as much as any man should be at rest.

"Done nothing to forfeit the obligations of the Government" to him? Educated from extreme youth to be a sailor, a defender, a professional defender in arms of the Republic, receiving its honors and its pay for half a century; an old man to be sure, but so much the greater the obligation, and then when the life of the Government was threatened, why his age is given as his only excuse for not being engaged in warfare against it. Why, sir, the records of the Department are full of tenders made by men of equal or possibly greater age, who scorned to be relieved by any technical right of exemption from the obligation to serve their country, and who came forward to offer it the feeble remnant of their days—to offer it their lives. But this man threw down his commission on the express ground that he must follow his State; that he was under no obligation to fight for the flag of his country; that on the contrary he was under an obligation to leave it to be trampled down by its enemies.

Now I am not going, on account of this man's devotion to the State-rights doctrine, to speak of him unkindly. My feeling toward him is not one of unkindness at all. I apprehend perfectly well how the younger and the older men too of the South were devoted to the doctrine of State rights. I am a State-rights man to a very large extent myself. I am not speaking of him unkindly, but when a man says to me he has done nothing whatever to forfeit the obligation the Government was under to him, I am compelled to fall back on the abstract principles of the case and to say he had done everything to forfeit every right he had in the world. The law upon the statute-book gives the punishment of death to the rebel; and if you drive us to the letter of the law I am obliged to say that. I am the last man to revive the painful past; but that was and is the law.

Do not tell me he had done nothing when he had done everything. If you come to us on the generous side, asking to waive the past, I will be found as ready to do so and to shake hands as any man in the land. I see before me men who were engaged in the rebellion. I believe I see before me—yes, I see before me—men who laid down their commissions to go into the rebellion. If you will let me alone, I will say nothing unkind to them. I will not do so in any emergency. But if you force us to the issue I must state the truth, however harsh it may seem.

The general law which says these debts shall not be paid is a good law. Whether I might waive the enforcement of that law in any case depends upon the particular circumstances. But we will not waive it if it be demanded as a right. Done nothing to forfeit! Why the fourteenth amendment is the eternal judgment of the people of this land that a man who went out, after giving his oath to support the Constitution, and aided and abetted the rebellion, forfeited every right he had to be again trusted in office. What does that amendment to the Constitution say?

No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice-President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any State, who, having previously taken an oath as a member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State Legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof.

That is the judgment of the nation after the appeal to the highest arbitrament known among nations. Somebody was right and somebody was wrong in that war, and somebody won.

That is the judgment of the people of this country as to who won in that war. Now, do not tell me that this man did nothing to forfeit anything, when he threw down his commission and willfully engaged in the rebellion. Invited to shake hands, I will drop controversy and go more than half way to meet you. But when you come to the logic of the law and the abstract justice of the case, and claim as unforfeited rights what would otherwise be fraternally granted for the sake of reconciliation, we have something else to say.

Mr. GOODE. Does the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] hold that even if it be admitted that Captain Page committed a sin in tendering his resignation, the Government has a right to visit that sin on his widow and his children?

Mr. HAWLEY. He virtually committed the crime of treason. If he fell a hair's breadth short of the crime, it was because he was physically incapable of committing it. And the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GOODE] proudly boasts here to-day that this man would have committed active, overt treason in the field but for his age and physical disabilities.

Mr. GOODE. And would you follow him beyond the grave for that?

Mr. HAWLEY. No, I will not follow him beyond the grave. I will go with you to his grave and build a monument over it for the services which he before rendered his country.

Mr. GOODE. We do not ask you to build a monument.

Mr. HAWLEY. I recall what the woman said of Benedict Arnold who has been referred to here. She said that she would take the leg which he lost at Saratoga and embalm it and bury it with all the honors of war, and hang the rest of his traitorous carcass upon the gallows. I have nothing against the military record of this old man; I honor it as much as any one can.

Mr. GOODE. And yet the gentleman would confiscate what belongs to his estate.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am speaking of the legal question. Do not mix up pathos and poetry and sympathy for the venerable lady presenting this claim with the argument upon the legal aspect of the case. I say that neither he nor his estate nor anybody representing it has a moral right, and as the statute stands has not the legal right to a dollar of this money. I am not now saying that I will not vote for this bill. But gentlemen should not say that this man had done nothing to forfeit his claim and that it is a legal debt due him. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. HOOKER. I desire to say but a single word. I regret that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] and the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY,] on a simple proposition to pay so small a sum of money as that embraced in this bill, should seem willing to extend the range of discussion so far as this debate has been extended. Sir, it would seem that there can scarcely be a claim presented here that does not give occasion for some reference to the war of the rebellion. There never could have been a claim of this kind presented to the Congress of the United States but for the act which was passed in 1871, when the republican party had a majority in the House of Representatives, a majority in the Senate, and a republican Executive. It was because the Government believed then, when the opposition had absolute control of the legislative and executive departments of this Government, that common justice required that whatever of money the Government had collected under what was known as the captured and abandoned property act should be paid to those who could show they were entitled to it.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] deprecates the fact that claims should stand now upon the Calendar of this House from any Southern State asking anything from this Government. Sir, the Government itself gave these claimants the right to appear here. The Supreme Court of the United States has repeatedly decided and especially in the case of ex parte Garland, that when either by general act or special pardon a man had been forgiven his offense he was restored to all the rights of citizenship as if he had never committed such offense.

Something has been said by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] comparing the men who were engaged in the confederate cause with Arnold, of black fame in the Revolution. If history teaches us aright, Arnold was a traitor to his country for a money consideration. I know of no man in the South who took sides for his section of whom that can be said.

It is not the first time in the history of our English-speaking people that a war of words has culminated in the wager of battle. From the time when our English-speaking ancestors on the banks of Runnymede extorted from King John the great writ of personal liberty; from the time when the English Parliament made its declaration of rights and passed its bill of rights, down to that memorable period in our own history when our ancestors on American soil assembled and declared that these colonies are, and of right ought to be, free and independent States—from all these instances we learn that it is not strange that our people, loving liberty, should sometimes differ and that a war of words should culminate in the wager of battle.

From the time of the war of the roses, when the red and the white struggled for predominance, and every fair field in England was ensanguine with Saxon blood shed by Saxon hands, down to that period when our own Revolution occurred, it has not been a strange thing for the English-speaking people to contend with one another.

The war of the rebellion occurred from a conviction of right on the one side and of right on the other. We submitted the question to the wager of battle. It was decided against us. We laid down our arms under the terms of the capitulation at Appomattox and in North Carolina.

What were those terms? I beg gentlemen on the opposite side of the House to remember they were that the men who were in arms against the Government should lay down those arms, retire to their homes, and yield obedience to the Government and its laws. What was stipulated on the other side? That when they did this they should have the protection of the Government, not its constant taunts and threats.

When you sent General Grant to the South he returned and reported to you that, taking all the Southern States together, in the main, they were prepared to reassume their relations to the Federal Government, to rehabilitate their States and resume allegiance to the Government. And that great general, when he had returned from his visit abroad and his visit to Mexico, spoke at Bloomington, Illinois, upon the temper and disposition of the southern people. In that speech, made only a few months before the nomination of the republican party for the Presidency, he said: "I have been from Philadelphia to Mexico, and on my return I have passed through all the rebel States. In all of them I have been received with great consideration and respect. Side by side, on committees of reception, stood the men who once wore the gray and the men who once wore the blue; speeches receiving me were made by the men who once wore the blue and the men who once wore the gray. I say to you that their eyes are as familiar with the colors of our flag as yours are. Simple justice requires it to be said that we have no right to doubt the loyalty of the men who once wore the gray to the flag of the nation." That was the sentiment of General Grant, and it was in keeping with the testimony he had previously given.

Now, when you talk about consigning to infamy men who acted from convictions of duty—such men as Robert E. Lee and Stonewall Jackson and Algernon Sidney Johnson—when you want to put upon such men a brand like that which you put upon the name and character of Arnold, allow me to say that, however great in intellect or power may be the man who makes this attempt, he will fail. For great as was the chief soldier of the confederate armies when he led his hosts to battle, he was greater still when that war was over and he retired to the shades of academic life to devote the remainder of his years to teaching the young men of the land he loved so well. When he died, Mr. Chairman, all over this land there was heard a universal regret that a great and good man had fallen. And as the wail of grief broke from his own loved mountain-side, it was caught up by the long swell of the Atlantic and wafted to the distant shores of the Old World, to come reverberating back in all the languages and tongues of the nations of the earth. [Applause.]

One word more and I have done. There have been, as I have said, instances of rebellion in the English nation. There was a memorable instance of rebellion on the part of the American colonies against Great Britain, and George Washington ranks as the first rebel of this country. But there was another scene enacted on another occasion, in which the rebel was punished. I allude to that memorable scene which occurred in an English court of justice, when, as the judge was about to pronounce sentence upon Robert Emmet, the prisoner from his place in the dock pronounced upon that judge a sentence which has been repeated by every schoolboy in our land, and which will live as long as the English language shall have a tongue to speak it or a pen to write it—as long as the heart of any English speaking man shall beat in response to the sentiments of liberty that Robert Emmet then uttered in pronouncing sentence upon a judge who had soiled the ermine that he wore. England erected a gibbet upon which Emmet was executed; and it was thought by some that through all the coming ages the finger of scorn would be pointed at him and contumely would be his only reward. But, Mr. Chairman, that gibbet was simply the foundation of the grand, magnificent pedestal upon which posterity has erected to the convicted rebel and traitor, Robert

Emmet, a monument which shall be more lasting than brass; for, Mr. Chairman, he stands upon its summit, and death hath only made him marble and immortal. [Applause.]

Mr. REED. Mr. Chairman, I dislike to interrupt the flow of eloquence which has proceeded from the other side—a torrent of eloquence so strong that it has even moved my friend from New York [Mr. COX] to depart from his usual custom of amusing the House and devote himself to really serious talk. I am glad on that account that this discussion has arisen, although I think I shall point out reasons why it is a pity that such discussions occur. My friends, this business of the past is not to be got over by fine speeches, or by labored eulogiums, or by discussion of the great and fine traits of generals who deserted their country in the hour of peril. There has been a great war; that war has been decided; and at the same time all the questions connected with it. The country demands that there shall be peace upon these subjects forever. Nobody desires it more than gentlemen upon this side of the House. We are tired and sick of alluding to the Southern rebellion and to Southern claims; and it is never our fault if this subject is brought up. It has never come up for discussion before this House except when some gentlemen on the other side (and especially the gentleman from Virginia) have attempted insidiously to break down the laws which this country has approved and which this side of the House is determined to stand by.

And we say to you that the verdict of the people of this country is clear and unmistakable, that none of you shall wipe out the war legislation which has been passed during the last ten or a dozen years. Now, I ask you why not accept the situation and accept the fact? Why are you everlastingly bringing up these topics of discussion? You know perfectly well you cannot bring one of them up without our discussing the facts connected with them, and you know a discussion of the facts connected with them always leads to scenes such as we have had this afternoon. Why, then, do you do it? Why do you come forward always after you have stirred up the discussion and say you really wish we would not talk about this? The idea of treading upon people and then reproaching them for making outcry! The idea of everlastingly ringing the changes on this subject and then getting up in—I was going to say hypocritical way, but perhaps that is strong language—but getting up and talking about your desire to have this subject buried! We want it buried just as much as you do. We want to forget about the rebellion, but we do not want to be called upon every day in the week, not to forget but to forgive.

Gentlemen, I want you to heed the warning which has been given you so well by the gentleman from Wisconsin, for I say to you he represents strong portions of your party in our part of the country. What we want, democrats and republicans alike, if we can have it, is oblivion of the past. At least we do not want everlasting discussions on the subject, and you are everlastingly provoking them.

Now you come up and say that this is a little matter; this is paying a widow $130. You must know that the principle upon which this bill goes would repeal this entire section of the statute. You know we are unwilling to repeal it. You know that every time you present a bill for southern claims you always present something that has a sympathetic side, and you urge it on that sympathetic side, and when you get it passed you know you mean to use it for a legal precedent. I say that course of action, coupled with the declaration you want quiet and silence, is not that manly and straightforward course of action which you ought to indulge in if you want the past forgotten, and if you want this country to be united and to go on prosperously and harmoniously, and prosperously because harmoniously.

Mr. WRIGHT. I have but a word to say. I have on all occasions, Mr. Chairman, voted against all claims presented by confederate people. I should continue to do so if I were a member of this House for any length of time to come. But this is not that case. This man, although he had sent in his resignation, yet at the time he sent his resignation in the Government owed him $130.85. Now, let me tell you, and I wish to state it in the hearing of every man here. This woman comes here as the widow of a brave man who behaved most courageously under Commodore Perry on Lake Erie, who served his country faithfully and well, and whose claim is just. It is just because it was owed before the rebellion began. It was a contract made between her husband and the Government. Nor do I think the statute law covers the case presented here. But I have to say further that which will perhaps more interest the House than this, and that is this: In my judgment, this bill is going to fail. There is no power here to pass it. If the friends who have it in charge will withdraw it from the files of the House, I will give that woman my check for the whole amount. [Applause.]

Mr. GOODE rose.

Mr. GUNTER. I move the committee rise.

Mr. GOODE. I have the floor. I am much indebted to the venerable gentleman from Pennsylvania. I appreciate the motive which prompted him to make the suggestion. It does honor to his heart. But I want this House and the country to understand that the widow of Hugh N. Page, the hero of Lake Erie, is not here begging alms. We come to ask the passage of this bill as a matter of simple, naked justice. The Government owed her husband for valued and distinguished service rendered. The Government owes that husband's estate to-day, and I maintain that if the Government now pursues him in his grave and says it will not pay the widow, that Government is guilty of rank repudiation. And if gentlemen on the other side are prepared to repudiate an honest debt, let them take the responsibility of setting an evil example and to look out for other debts due by the Government. [Cries of derision from the republican side of the House.]

Mr. GUNTER. I move the committee rise.

Mr. GOODE. I hope the gentleman will withdraw it, that we may have a vote.

Mr. GUNTER. I withdraw the motion that the committee rise on condition there shall be a vote at this time; but I do not withdraw it for further discussion.

Mr. GOODE. I move, then, that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. BURROWS. And pending that motion, I move the committee rise.

The committee refused to rise.

The question recurred on Mr. GOODE'S motion that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 79, noes 69.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. WHITE. I desire that we shall have a yea-and-nay vote in the House upon that.

Mr. COFFROTH. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HUNTON reported that the Committee of the Whole, having had under consideration the Private Calendar, had instructed him to report sundry bills to the House, some with and some without amendments.

Mr. WHITE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. There were some bills coming over from a former sitting of the Committee of the Whole which should be first considered. There was a bill undisposed of, the title of which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House bill No. 356, with amendments, a bill to provide for the sale of certain New York Indian lands in Kansas.

The SPEAKER. This bill occasioned discussion. The question was then pending when the committee rose. There were other bills behind it that gentlemen supposed would not occasion discussion. The Chair has been requested to ask that it be laid aside until such bills as shall provoke no discussion are disposed of.

Mr. WHITE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Pending the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the Chair desires to lay before the House certain executive communications, and also a request for leave of absence.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. KELLEY until Tuesday next, on account of important business.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Several members demanded the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that the House do now adjourn.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 107, noes 25.

So the motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and fifty-three minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

COUNT OF ELECTORAL VOTES.

Mr. INGALLS. I move the present consideration of the resolution offered by me on a previous day relative to the counting of the electoral votes. I ask that it may be reported to the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. That may interfere with the order of business for this morning. That is not the regular order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It will not interfere; you will have time enough; I shall not take ten minutes.

Mr. INGALLS. I understand that under the rule this resolution comes properly within the morning hour, it being a resolution offered on a previous day and on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator is right; it comes up as a matter of right.

The Chief Clerk read the following resolution, submitted by Mr. INGALLS on the 26th instant, and the Senate proceeded to consider it:

Resolved, That the Senate will be ready to receive the House of Representatives in the Senate Chamber on Wednesday, February 9, at twelve o'clock meridian, for the purpose of being present at the opening and counting of the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States. That two persons be appointed tellers on the part of the Senate to make a list of the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States as they shall be declared; that the result shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall announce the state of the vote, which shall be entered on the Journals, and if it shall appear that a choice hath been made agreeably to the Constitution, such entry on the Journals shall be deemed a sufficient declaration thereof.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I am very glad that the Senator from Kansas has brought this matter to the attention of the Senate. I move that the resolution be referred to the Select Committee for the consideration of the electoral vote for President and Vice-President of the United States.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Delaware moves that the resolution be referred to the select committee on the subject of the electoral count.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I am not able to see at this present moment why such a resolution should be referred as it merely provides for the simplest formality necessary or useful to the convenient discharge of the constitutional duty on the occasion referred to of the President of the Senate and of the two Houses of Congress. That is all. It is perfectly well known that nearly a year ago the Senate passed a general regulation called a joint rule for all cases of presidential elections. We have not been advised that the House of Representatives has agreed to that. That is all that I am justified or entitled to say in reference to its fate. It is now only I believe nine days——

Mr. INGALLS. Eight legislative days.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There are only eight legislative days before the duty you, sir, have to perform, whatever may happen, will devolve upon you; and I think, therefore, it is high time, and particularly as no conceivable question of dispute can arise, that the Senate should invite the House of Representatives to attend in the strictly, and only strictly constitutional place, in the presence of the President of the Senate of the United States for the purpose of being present with whatever constitutional function—I am not speaking of powers—may devolve upon the two Houses upon that occasion.

I cannot conceive what there is in the nature of this resolution that should require its reference to any committee. If the Senate is not willing to adopt it now, let it be rejected or laid upon the table, or postponed until to-morrow or next week; but what subject of inquiry or ground of investigation there may be by a committee that happens to exist instructed to inquire into the state of the law—if I remember the formation of that committee, and I think I do—respecting the elections of President and the counting and declaring of the result, I am unable to see. I hope, therefore, that the motion to refer will not prevail.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I recognize as fully as the honorable Senator from Vermont I think could desire the necessity for action by the two Houses of Congress upon this most important subject; and the reference that I have proposed is for the purpose of facilitating in the usual and regular manner the object which I suppose to have been had in view by the honorable Senator who introduced this resolution. A special committee was raised by this body more than a year ago entitled a Select Committee to take into consideration the ascertainment and declaration of the result of the election for President and Vice-President——

Mr. EDMUNDS. The state of the law on that subject, I think.

Mr. BAYARD. I believe I have given the title of the committee.

Mr. INGALLS. Let me read for the information of the Senate the title of the committee to which the Senator refers: "To take into consideration the state of the law respecting the ascertaining and declaration of the result of the elections of President and Vice-President of the United States."

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator has read it correctly. I had transcribed it upon a memorandum. That is the title of the committee.

The present resolution certainly touches matters germane to the purpose for which that committee was expressly created by this body. It is for the purpose of having prompt action upon this subject that I have submitted the motion for reference. I know that the days are drifting by very rapidly and the time is near at hand when the functions of the two Houses of Congress, whatever they may be, must be exercised under the Constitution in respect of this important question of ascertaining and declaring the result of the late election for President and Vice-President.

I do not propose at this time, nor would it be proper for me at this stage of the discussion, to refer at all to the action of the Senate one year ago, or to the fact that we were preparing then for certain possible contingencies which have been rendered by subsequent events unnecessary for present consideration. However interesting and important they may be in the principle to which they relate, much of the rule that was adopted by the Senate and which now has gone before the House of Representatives for their action, has been rendered unnecessary by subsequent events. Time has settled many questions that were then contingent; and my object in moving this reference is to expedite the action of the Senate in the usual and regular way through a committee appointed for a purpose germane to the object of this resolution to make a recommendation of action upon the part of the Senate, to be met by corresponding action I trust on the part of the House, and to facilitate the performance of our constitutional duties as two Houses of Congress upon this important subject.

Therefore I trust that there will be no misunderstanding by gentlemen in supposing there is the least desire to delay. On the contrary, there is a desire to facilitate the execution of the powers of the Senate over this subject, at least in the motion I have made, that this matter be referred to the committee indicated.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, in prescribing the discharge of a constitutional duty, section 142 of the Revised Statutes says:

> Congress shall be in session on the second Wednesday in February succeeding every meeting of the electors, and the certificates, or so many of them as have been received, shall then be opened, the votes counted, and the persons to fill the offices of President and Vice-President ascertained and declared, agreeable to the Constitution.

As the Senator from Vermont has already stated, there remain but eight legislative days between this and the period when that most important function of Congress is to be discharged. The votes have been registered; the certificates, as I understand, are in the custody of the officer designated by the Constitution; and thus far there has been no action by either House looking toward the assembling of the two Houses in the manner provided by the Constitution for the purpose of ascertaining one of the most significant and important facts that we are called upon to ascertain under the Constitution.

The resolution that I have offered is one that is strictly in accordance with the earliest precedents on the subject. It purposely and sedulously and studiously avoids all reference to every disputed question as to the right of any officer, or of either House of Congress, or of both Houses jointly, to decide upon any question that may arise either as to a disputed certificate or a duplicate return; and I have felt, inasmuch as there has been no effort made from any source hitherto to determine what shall be done upon this day of days in order to ascertain what shall be the course of this Government for the next four years after the 4th of March, that it was necessary and essential that some early action should be taken by the Senate. It has been delayed from considerations of courtesy until those questions should no longer rightfully be considered as having authority to prevail.

The motion that the Senator from Delaware has made to refer this resolution to a select committee of the Senate, I have no doubt is made with the best of motives and purposes, but the Senator will observe that that committee is a select committee for a specific purpose, which is to inquire into the state of the law. It is now, as I am reminded, a standing committee of the Senate although it was originally a select committee. That committee has discharged its functions, as I understand, by reporting a measure which has hitherto received the sanction of the Senate. But this resolution is not intended to ascertain the state of the law, but to meet an immediate, pressing, and imminent emergency.

Of course I am aware that the majority of the Senate of different political views from my own have control of this matter and can do with the resolution as they see fit; and if there can be an assurance that this resolution, or some resolution upon this subject that shall effectuate the purpose of the Constitution and the declarations of the law, will be reported at an early day, I do not know that personally I should object to it; but we have already ascertained from the action of that committee what their purposes and views are, and I believe with all respect to that committee, and with all respect to the Senator from Delaware who moves the reference, that if this resolution is referred it will either sleep or it will come forth amended in some important particulars that will render it ineffectual so far as the object that I have in view is concerned, to wit: to meet this question that is now imminent upon us, not what is the state of the law upon this subject, but how shall the two Houses get together on the 9th day of February to discharge a constitutional duty imposed upon them under the laws of Congress.

I shall, therefore, I believe, oppose the motion and ask for action on the part of the Senate on the resolution.

Mr. MORGAN. The election of President, the votes in which we are about to count, was the twenty-fourth presidential election in the Union. The votes at twenty of those elections have been counted, under resolutions of each of the Houses, in the Chamber of the House of Representatives. The votes at four of these elections have been counted in the presence of the Senate upon resolutions originating in the Senate inviting the House of Representatives to join this body for the purpose of ascertaining and counting the votes. In the largest majority of instances, in almost every instance, these resolutions have not been passed earlier than within three or four days before the time for counting. The two Houses have been in a state of entire composure upon this subject except in two instances, I believe, when questions arose by way of anticipation as to whether the votes of certain States should be counted. Then Congress, in one branch or the other, took up the subject earlier, for the purpose of considering and determining in advance what should be the action of the two Houses in certain particular cases, of which I believe there were only two.

I do not understand how it can be asserted by the honorable Senator from Vermont, if I did not misunderstand his assertion, that this resolution proposed the only constitutional method of counting the vote, or that the only constitutional method of counting the vote was to be in the presence of the Senate and in the Senate Chamber. That honorable Senator introduced into the Senate a bill as a substitute for the resolution which was adopted by the Senate last year, which provided by law that the votes of the electors for President and Vice-President should be counted in the House of Representatives. It certainly is a modern discovery of the Senator from Vermont that the electoral vote can only be counted in the Senate. I do not know what new light has been brought to bear upon the mind of the Senator to bring him to that conclusion; but certainly it is one of more recent date than that which illuminated his mind at the time he brought in the bill which proposed to enact a law that the counting of the vote should be in the presence of the House of Representatives and in their Chamber.

Now, what necessity is there for departing from a precedent which the Senate has observed since 1809 uniformly in reference to the place at which the two Houses usually assemble for the counting of the electoral vote? We understand that this Chamber is not sufficiently large, has not the conveniences to accommodate the House of Representatives in addition to the body that is here now. It would be a matter of almost impossibility to organize the two Houses in this Chamber, or to have them assemble in this Chamber in such a convenient manner as to enable them to transact business with propriety. I suppose it was in consideration of that fact that in 1809 we inaugurated the system, from which there has been since no departure, that the Senate would meet with the House in the Hall of the House of Representatives for the purpose of counting the votes. But now it is asserted, as I understand the proposition, that the vote can only be counted in the Senate Chamber, and in the presence of the President of the Senate, presiding over the Senate in this House. That is a question which, being brought forward at this late day, is one that seems to me worthy of some consideration; and I think the motion of the Senator from Delaware to refer the resolution to this committee is entirely a proper and well-timed motion, in order that that feature of the case may be considered, if no other.

It has twice occurred, in counting the electoral votes, that the question has been raised as to whether a State had cast its electoral vote in conformity to the express requirement of the Constitution, and a question of that kind is now pending, as we are informed, in reference to the State of Georgia. Heretofore Congress has undertaken by resolution to ordain and prescribe what was the state of the law with respect to counting the vote of a State which had not cast its vote at the time prescribed by the Constitution. That question is now presented for the consideration of the country, and it seems to me entirely proper that we should now consider whether the vote of the State of Georgia is to be counted or whether it is not to be counted, precisely as the same question was considered by the two Houses in reference to the votes of other States in times that are past.

For my own part I do not desire to see these two Houses brought together, and to see any question of dispute arising between them without any rule or regulation established in advance for the settlement of such a question. It is therefore proper, it seems to me, that this committee should take into consideration at least that question, and perhaps other questions that may arise in reference to the counting of the votes of the different States. I refer to this one question because the country is entirely informed of the fact that the votes of the electors of the State of Georgia were cast one week after the electors of the other States of the Union had met in their various electoral colleges and cast their votes. It may not be the disposition of some Senators to have this question settled in advance, or, indeed, the Senate itself may not come to that conclusion. I understand a resolution that has just been adopted has sent that question to the Committee on the Judiciary, so that that matter of debate and dispute may be solved; and the Senate should not adopt a rule inviting the House to this Chamber or prescribing any regulation for the meeting of the two Houses, at least until that committee has acted on that question.

It is very well known that before the last presidential election and before any question arose in the country as to the State of Georgia or any other State, with a view to prescribing some regulation governing the action of the two Houses no matter how the presidential election might turn out, the Senate adopted a rule and sent it to the House of Representatives. Is it entirely becoming in the Senate of the United States, before the House has acted on that rule, now to send them a different proposition and thereby indicate a purpose on the part of the Senate, to abandon the ground they have taken or the principles involved in that rule? It seems to me that a proper sense of respect for the House of Representatives would lead us to give them ample time to consider that question before we undertake to reverse our own action and recall that which we have so solemnly done.

The House of Representatives, it may be said, has had ample time to act upon it, but we are not to be the judges of that fact. It is not my right to allude to what has taken place in the House of Representatives, but I think I can say to the honorable Senators on the other side of the Chamber that the party represented by those who sympathize with this side of the Chamber are not responsible for any delay that has taken place in the adoption of that rule, or of any other measure.

The honorable Senator from Kansas says, if he had the assurance that this committee would act promptly, that the committee would not delay its action, he would be satisfied to have this resolution go to the committee. I should like to ask that honorable Senator if he has discovered on the part of this committee, or any member of it, a disposition to delay action on any question connected with the counting of the electoral votes?

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator did not exactly quote my language. I said that personally I should have no objection on assurance being given that early action would be had, but that inasmuch as that committee had already expressed their views upon the subject I apprehended that perhaps there would be delay or else amendments, and I thought it better to ask, therefore, action on the part of the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Delaware has very properly suggested that a great many of the questions that were anticipated by the order taken in the Senate upon the rule it adopted have not actually arisen in this presidential count. Some of the questions, however, have arisen and have to be disposed of by the action of these two Houses or by the action of somebody else. The Vice-President must decide the question for the Senate and for the House of Representatives, or else it must be decided by some concurrent action of the two Houses. It may be that there are parts of that rule as adopted by the Senate which are not now material to be enacted into the form of a joint agreement between the two Houses; but certainly there are portions of that rule which are not included in the resolution of the Senator from Kansas, which are necessary to be considered; and the democratic party, I may say, and also the members of that committee have not the slightest disposition to delay action, but on the contrary their disposition has been urgent all the time to quiet the mind of the country in reference to this great matter, so that the Senator from Kansas need have no apprehension of a want of attention, diligent attention, on the part of this committee to the consideration of his resolution if it shall be referred.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Mr. President, I shall vote for the motion to refer this resolution, because I believe it is the best method of securing action in this case. Unfortunately we have no law regulating the count of the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States. I suppose the matter has lost much of its interest because everybody in this country concedes that Mr. Garfield has been elected President of the United States by the people in the manner prescribed by the Constitution, and he will be inaugurated; and if all the gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber, and all the gentlemen of like politics on the other side of the House of Representatives were to retire and go to their homes, he would still be inaugurated by the majority that would be left, and peaceably inaugurated. So far as the next count is concerned, nobody need have any apprehension of trouble. But of course there ought to be some method of proceeding, I admit that, so as to secure order in counting the votes, so as to prevent the commission of errors; but we should make no unnecessary concessions as to who has the right to count the votes, and all that kind of nonsense, as you will excuse me for terming it.

But I rise now to say that I had not given this subject very great attention until recently. I have devoted myself to it recently with some degree of care. I have concurred in the action taken heretofore, have voted for the joint resolution I believe reported by the Senator from Alabama. I take it for granted those matters have become of small moment now; but after having given this subject the attention that I think it deserves, I simply want to say that in my judgment this provision of the Constitution, which provides for the counting of the vote for President and Vice-President ought, like all other provisions of the Constitution, to be carried out by law of Congress. That is what I want to put on record as my opinion in this matter.

The twelfth article of amendment says, in the language of the original Constitution itself:

> The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted.

Of course my opinion is that the votes cannot be counted by the President of the Senate except under the direction of the two Houses. But how will you get the two Houses together? How will you get the President of the Senate to preside over the joint convention? What shall be the process of doing it? It must require the concurrence of two Houses. How shall the votes be counted? Who shall determine which is a legal vote and which is an illegal vote? Take the very question alluded to and arising now from my own State. The Constitution explicitly provides that Congress shall fix the time for choosing electors and shall prescribe the day on which the electors shall cast their votes, which day shall be the same throughout the United States. My State has cast her vote not on the day prescribed by Congress; in all other respects she has complied with the Constitution and the law. Somebody must determine whether that vote cast on another day ought or ought not to be counted. Who is to determine it? How are you to get at the determination? What shall be the proceeding? I wish simply to say that, in my judgment, these and many other things satisfy me that this whole matter of counting the votes for President and Vice-President and carrying out the provision of the Constitution in relation thereto ought to be regulated by law.

Suppose you pass a joint rule, what Congress does that joint rule bind? Can this Congress pass a joint rule of the two Houses to bind the next Congress? If it be matter of joint rule, or matter of mere rule, it is subject to change at any time by either House. I believe that question was up four years ago, and it was decided by an overwhelming majority of the gentlemen of both parties that a joint rule was adopted by each Congress for itself. Suppose, then, you pass a joint rule now that binds this Congress and we count the vote according to the joint rule, as this is the Congress that has to count the votes; but that fixes nothing as to the next Congress and fixes nothing as to the Congress that shall count the vote in 1884. The Congress which counts the vote in 1884, if the matter is to be regulated by joint rule, may adopt its own joint rule and not be bound by the joint rule adopted by this Congress. It is very clear to my mind that there is but one way out of this difficulty to avoid future trouble, and that is that this whole matter ought to be carried out by a law which no one House can repeal, which shall be binding as every other law; and when that is the law on the statute-book we shall all comply with and all will be compelled to comply with it. I believe the highest duty of the Judiciary Committee is at as early a day as possible, either at this session or the next, to prepare a well-considered bill on this subject, report it, and let it become a law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] seems to think that I have got some new light respecting the Constitution touching the powers and duties of the President of the Senate and the place where he is to exert them. If that were true, it would be a subject of congratulation to me, for I think the more true new light we get about the Constitution, the better; and if it would not be offensive, I would humbly submit that it might not be injurious for other Senators to try to get fresh illumination and from higher and wider sources than mere party warmth, respecting the true and fundamental meaning of that great instrument that secures us all.

But, Mr. President, I do not know that I am entitled to claim the benefit of these congratulations at this time. I did not say that I thought that this place was under all circumstances the only place where constitutionally the votes for President and Vice-President could be counted.

Mr. MORGAN. Then I misunderstood the Senator from Vermont. I understood him distinctly to state that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What I did say was that it was the place where most naturally and, construing the Constitution strictly, perhaps where constitutionally it may be done, inasmuch as the Constitution says, not the person who happens to be President of the Senate, but that officer who may be the Vice-President or the President pro tempore, the official chief of the Senate, shall do a certain thing on a certain day. Now, where do you find the official chief of the Senate? You find him nowhere except in the place that you now, sir, so well occupy, unless you say that it is competent for the Senate of the United States to adjourn its sitting from one room in the Capitol or one part of the town which constitutes the capital to another, and that authority I do not mean to deny and I do not mean to take time to discuss it. But I say that in the absence of such an adjourned meeting and in the absence of other provision connected with it for the concurrent assembling of the two Houses to be in the presence of the act that you as chief of this Senate are to perform, this Chamber, this place is where this duty that the Constitution imposes upon you ought to be performed and must be performed and I hope will be performed according to the Constitution; and if it happens that some other part of the Government, over which you have no control, fails to perform its constitutional duty of being in the presence of that great event, that the event will nevertheless go on for whatever legal consequence may follow from it, and that would not be a very difficult question in my mind as a matter of law.

So we may dismiss that part of it. Then we come down to the question of convenience in respect of this resolution. Inasmuch as the House of Representatives have not been able now for a year to come to an agreement touching this matter, I think it would not be very courteous for the Senate to send a resolution to the House of Representatives that on the second Wednesday in February the President of the Senate, attended by the Senate, will appear in that House, take possession of the chair of the Speaker, and proceed to count the votes, or take possession of the area behind the seats. That would be an unseemly proceeding. Consequently in the absence of coming to any solution of the question proposed by the Senator from Alabama, the Senator from Kansas has proposed this, which is precisely the resolution that the Senate passed in the year 1801 when there was a great contest and a great doubt as to who should come out to be the President of the United States in the state of things that then existed, and when the two Houses had failed, as they have now, to come to any common understanding beforehand upon the subject; and that was, as this resolution declares, that the Senate would receive the House of Representatives on the day fixed by law and at an hour named, and proceed to execute the formality.

What is the objection? The Senator from Alabama says there is a physical objection. I think he is mistaken. We have had impeachment trials in this Chamber when the House of Representatives attended in a body to present their articles; and we know from the space of this apartment that every member of the Senate and every member of the House of Representatives and all the proper officers of the two Houses can find sufficient and ample and convenient room, if we dare to take the step of excluding for the time being the people who grace our sittings by courtesy, to do that act or any other act. So much for that.

I am sorry that the Senator from Alabama has chosen to refer to parties about this business and to say, if I understood him, that it is not the fault of the party of which he is one of the great chiefs that his scheme has not been acted upon before now. The Constitution, in respect of this affair, has nothing to do with parties that I know of. We have to do with the constitutional duty of the two Houses to be present and of the President of the Senate to do an act, and then another act to follow, whoever may do it. I do not go into that at all. Happily, in this instance, it is of no possible consequence who does it, as a fact; as a precedent it may be but as a mere formality of arithmetic and computation and reading, it is not of the least consequence either as a precedent or any other thing who does it whether you do it, sir, or the Secretary at the desk does it, or the gentlemen whom we are accustomed to call tellers do it.

Mr. President, if this matter were now pending in the Senate on the resolution proposed from the committee of which my friend from Alabama is the chairman, and any number of gentlemen in the Senate of whatever party should believe that the proposition was not only unconstitutional but revolutionary, and that it had been put in such a form that its unconstitutionality could not be met in the way that the Constitution provides for meeting unconstitutional legislation, and that is by the veto of the President of the United States and a reconsideration by the two Houses, then I say that that body of gentlemen would be justified, in my opinion, in leaving it to those who chose to adopt such a supposed unconstitutional and revolutionary method to carry it out themselves if they could.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from Vermont to the fact that the morning hour has expired. He presumes there will be no objection to the Senator proceeding and finishing his remarks.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So that, Mr. President, it appears to me that the wise thing for the Senate to do is to consider this resolution now, which is precisely the resolution of the fathers under the same circumstances. If it should be thought preferable to endeavor to arrange the formalities by a conference, then if this resolution is not referred some gentleman can move as an amendment to it that a committee of three Senators be appointed to confer with such similar committee as the House of Representatives may choose to appoint to arrange this formality. I do not know that I should object to that; but to send this resolution, pure and simple as it is founded on the action of the fathers in a similar case, to a standing committee of nine members appointed to consider lawful provisions and not formalities, is simply to say in my judgment that we shall take no step about it in time, or at least no effective step about it; because we can readily see that if that committee were to adhere to its original opinion that there ought to be a joint rule of general provisions, or, as the Senator from Alabama has said, that it would not be courteous to the House of Representatives to take any step until it shall have acted upon the proposition sent there nearly a year ago, there is an end of any usefulness to this resolution.

So I hope, Mr. President, not as a party man or a party Senator, but as one member of the Senate desiring to perform my duty in getting the two Houses into your presence on the occasion referred to, that this resolution will be considered now and adopted in some form or other.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. THURMAN. I hope the vote will be taken on the motion to refer and without further debate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Delaware to refer the pending resolution to the Committee to take into consideration the state of the law respecting the ascertaining and declaration of the Result of the Elections of President and Vice-President of the United States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia, (when Mr. BROWN'S name was called.) My colleague [Mr. BROWN] has been necessarily called away from the city. He is paired on political questions with the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. TELLER.]

Mr. INGALLS, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. WITHERS,] who has been called away by a calamity in his family. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. TELLER, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. BROWN.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. WALLACE, (when his name was called.) On all political questions I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. WINDOM, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] on all political questions, and this assumes that character.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have been paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HEREFORD] up to Thursday; but I do not see him in his seat and I prefer not to vote. I should vote "nay" if I felt at liberty to vote.

The result was announced—yeas 29, nays 18; as follows:

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following joint resolutions; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 362) to authorize the printing of 50,000 copies of special report of Commissioner of Agriculture, relative to diseases of swine, and infectious and contagious diseases incident to other domestic animals; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 364) providing for the printing of reports of the Smithsonian Institution, and for other purposes.

The message also returned to the Senate, in compliance with its request, the bill (H. R. No. 2180) granting an increase of pension to James H. Reeve.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled joint resolutions; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 224) to print 6,000 copies of the report of the National Board of Health; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 266) ratifying settlement of taxes made by the District commissioners with the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company.

PUBLIC GROUND IN CHICAGO.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. The Chicago lake-front bill is now the regular order.

Mr. ALLISON. By unanimous agreement yesterday it was understood that that bill should come up this morning.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. That was the reason I objected to the resolution of the Senator from Kansas being taken up.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, under the understanding of yesterday, proceeds to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1935) to confirm to the city of Chicago the title to certain public grounds. The amendments reported by the Committee on the Judiciary will be read in order.

The first amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary was, in line 9, after the word "with," to strike out "authority to" and insert "the consent of the United States that said city may;" so as to read:

That all right and title of the United States to the streets and grounds dedicated to public use in that part of the city of Chicago, in the State of Illinois, known as "Fort Dearborn addition to Chicago," subdivided and platted under the authority of the Secretary of War in the year 1839, be, and the same hereby is, relinquished and granted to the said city and its successors, with the consent of the United States that said city may sell and convey so much thereof as lies south of the south line of Randolph street, and between the east line of Michigan avenue, as now laid out and improved, and the roadway of the Illinois Central Railway Company.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 15, after the word "station-house," to strike out "and other purposes incident thereto" and insert "or any other public purpose consistent with the health and convenience of the people of said city;" so as to read:

For the erection thereon of a railway passenger station-house or any other public purpose consistent with the health and convenience of the people of said city.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after the word "exist," in line 19, to strike out "to compensation on account of the change of use to which the public ground herein authorized to be sold and conveyed was originally dedicated by the United States" and insert "nor shall any such change of use be made unless the owners of the lots facing the 'public ground' lying between Randolph street and Madison streeet, to the extent of at least three-fourths of the aggregate linear frontage of said lots, shall have given their consent thereto in writing;" so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall deprive the owners of contiguous lots of any valid right or claim, if such exist; nor shall any such change of use be made unless the owners of the lots facing the "public ground" lying between Randolph street and Madison street, to the extent of at least three-fourths of the aggregate linear frontage of said lots, shall have given their consent thereto in writing.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think I ought to call the attention of the Senate, so that the Senate will vote understandingly, to the point of this amendment. The amendment seems to go upon the theory, as the bill does, that there are private and personal rights of property in these abutters who own in their own right separate and several lots. Now this amendment proposes to give the consent of Congress with whatever responsibilities may follow from that, inasmuch as Congress now owns the fee which is said to have been dedicated to this use, to this change of the use of the property, if a certain majority,—three-fourths I believe—consent to it. Now if the one-fourth whose consent is not necessary should insist upon their private rights, the force of this act is to deprive them of them nevertheless; so far as the action of Congress is concerned it authorizes that to be done. What will be the responsibility in the way of private bills hereafter for redress in behalf of these people, I do not know. Of course I take it that if these private rights are vested once, they could hardly be divested by the consent of three-fourths in number of people who had separate titles and no connection with each other. And so far the act would be effectual provided there are these private rights that Congress cannot affect, about which I say nothing just now; but I thought it right to call the attention of the Senate to the possibilities that might flow from such a provision. As I said yesterday, I do not expect to have my views prevail respecting the impropriety of this legislation in general; but at the same time not wishing to retard it at all, I thought it due from me as one member of the committee to state to the Senate the difficulties that may possibly arise.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. This provision does not interfere with any private rights, nor is it intended to. Congress gives its consent that the city of Chicago shall change this use, so far as it can give any consent, upon the application of three-fourths of the property holders who are interested in the question. One or two property holders might object, if you said the consent of all should be requisite, and the use could not be changed at all; but their rights are not interfered with. You have, after all, to buy them out either by a voluntary contract with them or by condemning the interest that they have. It seems to me that, not to give the consent of Congress unless all the adjoining owners agreed, would defeat the very object of the bill, because any person who felt that he could get a very large sum from the common council would interpose an objection. I know there is one person who objects, and of course his lot will have to be bought or he will have to be satisfied in some way. All of these property holders that abut there must be satisfied. It strikes me that it would defeat the whole object of the bill to require more than three-fourths. It was originally two-thirds; but I enlarged it myself to three-fourths.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. As all the amendments of the committee are now disposed of, I move to add as an additional section the following:

SEC. 2. Nothing in this act contained shall be held to impair or in any way affect the right or title of the United States in or to block 1, or the streets or waters surrounding it, in said Fort Dearborn addition to Chicago.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I have two amendments upon which the committee has not passed, but to which I think my friend, the Senator from Vermont, will not object. The bill gives "the consent of the United States that said city may sell and convey so much thereof" of the public ground as is specified. The larger power, in the opinion of the committee, embraced the smaller; license to sell and convey includes a license to lease; but some over-scrupulous persons doubt this. Therefore, I move, in line 10, after the word "may," to insert the words "lease or;" so as to read "the consent of the United States that said city may lease or sell."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I have another amendment that is in the interest of the public. At the end of line 15 I move to insert:

For the joint use of all such railway companies as may be willing to unite on equal terms in such lease or purchase and the construction of the said station-house by paying their just proportionate share of the cost or expense thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have not the committee's print of the bill, but the proviso that appears in the original bill from line 15 to line 20 reads:

That nothing herein contained shall deprive the owners of contiguous lots of any valid right or claim, if such exist, to compensation on account of the change of use to which the public ground herein authorized to be sold and conveyed was originally dedicated by the United States.

That confines the security of private rights to the adjoining lot-owners.

Mr. THURMAN. The words beginning "to compensation" down to the words "United States" have been stricken out and other language substituted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As I said yesterday, a Chicago gentleman named Swett, who I am told by my honorable friend from Illinois is a highly reputable gentleman in all the respects at least that bear upon this question, maintains, I do not know whether wisely, and legally, and well, I presume not——

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Did not our committee pass upon his views?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, but our committee unhappily,—I wish it were,—is not the end of the law. He maintains that this conveyance by the United States will have the effect, supposing it be valid, to deprive his clients of existing legal rights. My friend from Illinois thinks it will not, because he thinks they have not any existing legal rights. I do not know whether they have; I presume they have not; but the Constitution has not invested me with the right to decide just at this present moment whether they have or not. They have shown in their petition or protest, which I presented yesterday in connection with this bill, that they are trying to assert what they claim to be their legal rights in the courts. Therefore in order to guard the United States against doing injustice and against making itself responsible for having done injustice, if it turns out that there are existing any other legal rights, I move to add, after the word "United States," at the end of the proviso in the print I have before me, the words "nor shall this act affect any valid and lawful adverse private right." That is, I believe, the phrase that is put into all bills of this kind to guard against misconception. I presume my friend from Illinois will have no objection.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I do not want Congress to recognize anything about this Valentine scrip case; it is so barefaced. The bill does not interfere with any private right whatever.

Mr. THURMAN. It cannot.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. It cannot interfere with any private right at all. I do not want the Congress of the United States to recognize that case in any way, and it will be supposed that it does recognize it, because the Senator from Vermont says that it is upon the application of these Valentine scrip men that he makes the motion to amend the bill. The idea that Congress ever intended, in the heart of a great city, to allow Valentine, a California speculator, to get these lands is something to which I do not want to give assent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. WALLACE in the chair.) The amendment of the Senator from Vermont will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. After "United States," in line 22, it is proposed to insert "nor shall this act affect any valid and lawful adverse private right."

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will add "if any such exists," so as to preclude any recognition, which I certainly did not mean to make.

Mr. THURMAN. I think it is of no earthly consequence whether the amendment is adopted or not. I cannot for the life of me see any use in it, because how a release by the United States of its right to insist on the purposes of this dedication can take away any man's private right is a little beyond my comprehension. I do not see, therefore, that Mr. Valentine or anybody else can be injured by the simple consent which the United States gives to an alienation of its property by the city of Chicago, the United States not joining in any conveyance or making any guarantee or warranty or anything of the sort, but simply releasing or waiving its right to insist upon the purposes of the dedication. I do not know that the amendment will do any harm. The truth about it is that the words as they stand, if I understand this Valentine claim, if it had any validity, would include Valentine. I do not understand that Mr. Valentine has located his floating scrip upon the property that was originally a part of the Fort Dearborn reservation.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. No, it is upon new lands made by the Illinois Central Railroad by its track and filling in.

Mr. THURMAN. He has endeavored to gobble up with fifty dollars' worth of scrip what his counsel say here is worth $5,000,000. I am not very much disposed to aid in doing anything of that kind; but if it is necessary for him to be protected by anything that is in the bill, if he has any claim, he does abut upon the very land to which we release our right, and therefore he does come under the very terms of the bill as it now stands, and I do not see any necessity for amending it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The morning hour has expired. By unanimous consent the Senate will continue the consideration of this bill.

Several SENATORS. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and the Indian severalty bill is informally laid aside.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am a little surprised to hear my friend, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, and the only real barrier that stands between private rights and the Treasury of the United States and the over-running armies of invasion that always surround those two things, object to this amendment.

As I said when I offered it, I have no admiration for Mr. Valentine's claim as far as I understand it, but I am not able to see, as my friend from Ohio apparently seems to see, that I have any right as a Senator, if Valentine has any legally existing title to this present fort, to deprive him of it because I think so. The Constitution has left it to a different tribunal to do that thing; and if the same experience happens to us if we reject this amendment that has happened to us a good many times before, if it should turn out, as I hope it will not, that these people have got any legal rights by this alleged location, we shall be called upon to respond and shall have to do it. Inasmuch as it is said that we have not got anything but a barren title and are not to have any part of the three-quarters of a million of money that is to be given for it, I thought it due to the protection of public interests and to fair play as to private rights to offer precisely the amendment that, without objection, and by unanimous consent, on every other bill that has ever been presented of an analogous character has been agreed to.

I think the Senator from Ohio is somewhat in danger of being mistaken in supposing that the bill as it stands secures the right of Valentine, if that is his name, if he has any right. The language of the bill referring to the existing plat and dedication, as it is called, in speaking of abuttal, refers to those who have bought property from the United States as a part of the Fort Dearborn addition, and have paid their money for it, and I think any court would so construe it; but having offered this amendment and explained it, it is for the pleasure of the Senate to say what they will do.

Mr. TELLER. Let the amendment be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 22, after the words "United States," it is proposed to insert "nor shall this act affect any valid and lawful adverse private right, if any such exists."

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us have the yeas and nays on that.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, the yeas and nays being ordered, I venture to assign my reasons for voting against the amendment. The phrase "rights or remedies, if any," as suggested in the amendment, has always been endeared to me since it was incorporated in the so-called electoral bill. It was then the child of western genius, and now it is the adopted child of the East. "Rights, if any." I commence by making obeisance to the great legal principle preserved by that phraseology.

Had the words suggested by the Senator from Vermont, even without this potential "if any," been reported by the Judiciary Committee, I should see no objection to it, because I agree entirely with the honorable Senator from Ohio, that with or without these words the pending bill exerts no influence upon the legal rights of any claimant of this property except the United States. But the protest having been laid upon all our tables, I suppose,—it was laid on mine, yesterday, and I listened to a part of it as read by the Secretary of the Senate, which protest puts forward a particular claim,—the question is whether the Senate wishes to give to that claim such authority, such effect, not in law but for other purposes, as will come from the adoption of an amendment in some sort recognizing it.

I do not know this claimant. I have no right to say, and no wish to say, anything disparaging of him. I heard a statement of the Senator from Illinois yesterday, in which statement was incorporated a decision of the Supreme Court, the Senator from Illinois himself holding the pen for the court when that decision was made; and respecting that decision, and believing what is said in it, and by the Senator, we cannot resist the conclusion that this is rather a desperate claim, a claim which may be wielded by this individual or it may not, a claim which may be a tool in the hands of speculators, and possibly if it were any city except Chicago I should say in the hands of strikers; that is what they are sometimes called in other cities, men who have some dormant charter, some latent claim, some desperate or preposterous thing, which if it can receive countenance somewhere so as to give it buoyancy and consideration may be made the means of extorting money, of driving a bargain, and sometimes such things are so used as to levy blackmail and contributions. As I have said, I do not mean to characterize this claim; I have no right to say anything to disparage it; I have no power to say anything which legally would disparage it; but when I see that the bill leaves it in statu quo, that it does not impair it in any regard, I object, upon the presentation of this claim in the Senate, to the adoption of an amendment avowedly for its benefit, putting in special words which may look, not perhaps to a court which would see through the thing, but to other persons in some other forum, as if here was a serious mare's nest, and which might possibly drive some board of directors or a common council or trustees negotiating to think that to extinguish this thing, pestilent though they might regard it, they had better give a pretty large douceur than to run the risk of being tangled by injunctions and ensnarled by litigation and by controversy.

I know how far the Senator from Vermont would be from offering an amendment which would have by any intention of his any such effect; but I submit to the Senate that when the bill saves the rights of everybody, and, as I understand it, parts with nothing which belongs to the United States, that is enough. Here is a technical estate in the United States of no money value. For forty-two years this land has been effectually and irrevocably dedicated to the public use. I say irrevocably, because among other things abutting owners have bought not only upon a record which dedicated it, not only upon a plot which exhibited it, but upon the express sanction of the ministers of the Government itself, and therefore no grantor, be it a Government that may sometimes assume to be a law unto itself, or an individual amenable to law, can ever again be heard to say that this property thus dedicated shall be resumed.

The light-house having been transplanted to another and a distant site, there being no possible use of preserving open view and vacancy of land, the question is, whether this irrevocably dedicated strip of land and the much larger area of land artificially and expensively made, where once and always before the waters of the lake were, shall be kept, as the honorable Senator from Illinois said, with a dog-in-the-manger disposition, of no use to anybody, or whether a great and growing community shall be permitted to so far change that use as to utilize the property for the benefit of all. I say of all, because in this day of incessant locomotion, in this day of railways and railway centers, in the city of Chicago with its conveniences, to alight from a car and to get into that car in comfort at all seasons of the year, is not only a public use, but a use which concerns every citizen of the Republic from its center to its circumference. The whole question is whether such a use, suitable, convenient, needed, shall or shall not be made of a piece of property in which the United States has no more money interest than it has in the Hanging Garden of Babylon or the Hundred Gates of Thebes.

Mr. THURMAN. That is strong enough.

Mr. CONKLING. And it is true, too. Therefore when some Senator rises to say that he proposes that the Government shall take tribute out of this purchase-money the suggestion gains no sympathy from me, and that, because in addition to my belief that it would not be right, I think the last, the worst, the most pernicious policy which can be pursued by a great government is to play in any case the part of a Sir Giles Overreach, or to attempt by might to overstep those barriers which conclude individuals.

Such being this case, Mr. Valentine being left untouched, and this not being Valentine's day, I am opposed to selecting him and putting any buoyancy for any purpose anywhere in a claim which having undergone scrutiny in the highest judicial forum has been pronounced groundless, and under which, if I understand it, Mr. Valentine proposes, as the Senator from Ohio has said, with a plant of $50 to cast out his shoe over $5,000,000 of property. I have heard sometimes of putting in a shoe-string and taking out a tan-yard as typical of speculations, but I must think that this piece of enterprise would exceed even that. Yet if Mr. Valentine with a scrip can reduce to possessio pedis, or something else, five million dollars' worth of property in Chicago, that is the misfortune of Chicago. I do not wish to be art or part in intimidating, in frightening, in alarming, in suggesting to laymen or anybody else, that the claim is any bigger now than it was when somebody caused this pamphlet to be printed and spread around on the desks of Senators. I am willing that it should be just as valid as it was before that pamphlet came in here; I would resist any amendment to cut it off; but I would not like to see proceedings here which anywhere might have the effect of attaching a fictitious or unreal value to this so-called claim.

Therefore, I propose for one to adhere to the bill as it was reported by the committee, I may say, I think, without trenching upon a rule or committing an impropriety, not only after consideration but after unusually careful consideration, and as it stands now still further defended from the possibility of doing injury by the abundant caution which the Senator from Illinois has exhibited in the amendments he has added. I am willing to stand there, although I observe that in the interest of somebody considerable public attention has been drawn to this matter, considerable animadversion has been bestowed upon it, and I believe it has somewhere been denominated as a job, as if something improper was involved in it.

The Senator from Vermont has submitted as a minority of the Judiciary Committee his views, of which I say that I think they are stated with remarkable candor. I cannot see that any friend of this measure has a right to find any fault with the statement which the honorable Senator has made; and the effect of that statement is to show that the Government has no estate here of any value whatever, (if I read this report aright, none at all,) but that inasmuch as these parties propose among themselves that a new use shall be imparted to this property, it might be well to insist that the United States should receive some benefit, some pecuniary advantage, some emolument; I know not what word would exactly describe it; recompense or payment would not, because that implies that the Government has something to part with. I do not think so. On the contrary, I am willing that the city of Chicago and the whole people who go and come through Chicago, should avail themselves conveniently of a piece of property of no value to the Government, which the Government is forever estopped from resuming, and which, as it is now, is of very little utility in any way whatever.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. President, an interesting question is presented under the amendment, in one aspect of the case an important one, and I ask the indulgence of the Senate only for a few moments to give my views upon it.

All the points involved in the bill were maturely considered by the Committee on the Judiciary, except the point that is now presented by the amendment of the honorable Senator from Vermont. The consideration of that has come into the Senate since the bill was reported, upon a protest, a copy of which I have in my hand, signed by Mr. Swett, of Chicago, and Curtis, Earle, and Burdett, of the District of Columbia, for the parties claimant. After stating in general what they conceive to be certain claims upon some of this property, they close the petition in this way:

> Under these circumstances we respectfully protest against the passage of any law which may tend to obstruct the proper legal tribunals in administering the justice demanded by the said claimants, or which may abridge them of any of their rights.
> If it shall be deemed best to enact the proposed legislation, we respectfully ask that a proviso be inserted which will fully and effectually protect these and all other private rights.

I suppose out of abundant caution the attorneys for the claimants thought it best to present this paper to Congress. As I understand the law and the current decisions without dispute in the courts of the United States and the courts of the States, this is unnecessary. There are just two ways for the Government of the United States to part with its title to land. One is by a grant of Congress, and the other is by a patent. It matters not how many grants may be given or how many patents may issue to a particular piece of land, it affects no existing right upon that land upon the part of any claimant; he is not compromised a particle; he is not prejudiced in the least, because the holder under the grant or patent would be considered in a court of equity simply a trustee holding the title for the claimant if he makes his claim good, upon that elementary principle of equity that those things are considered in equity as done which ought to be done. In the case of Ryan vs. Carter, in 3 Otto Reports, 93, where that question came up, the Supreme Court held that it was unnecessary to put in words of this sort, because the party stood, if he had his right, just as he stood before. To illustrate: if Valentine has claims to this property, forty grants from Congress or forty patents would not affect those claims if they have already been perfected as far as the party claimant could perfect them. The party claimant might simply have to sue somebody else, or he might have to change his remedy. If the title goes to the city of Chicago or any person else under this proposed law, Mr. Valentine's claim, or a claim under, by, or through him, would simply be to make these persons parties to the proceeding, as in the nature of a purchaser, pending a suit, of property that is in litigation.

Then while sometimes it is true, as was said by the Senator from Vermont, that these phrases are put in saving the rights of claimants, it is surplusage, it is unnecessary. You do not affect Mr. Valentine, you do not put him one inch higher or one inch lower by this act. It simply changes possibly the form and the person against whom he must seek his remedy. It does not obstruct the legal tribunals in administering the justice demanded at all. If the proceedings are before the Department here the Department has washed its hands of it by this grant, and he then has his remedy in the courts. If they are before the courts they simply have to change the parties in the suits, if the suits are pending.

It is not worth while to go over all the litigation and all the cases that have been decided so often and so repeatedly upon this proposition. I think the amendment of the Senator from Vermont under the state of the case is unnecessary, it is mere surplusage; it does not give Mr. Valentine any better right than he had before. The whole question outside of this one proposition was considered maturely and at length by the Judiciary Committee, and I think the amendment is an unnecessary one.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The distinguished Senator from Illinois yesterday, and the still more distinguished Senator from New York to-day, have decorated, if I may borrow a phrase of an orator with whom I have the pleasure of an acquaintance, my humble minority report as an instance of the dog-in-the-manger policy.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the honorable Senator suffer himself to be interrupted for one moment?

Mr. EDMUNDS. With pleasure.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish for myself, and for everybody whose remarks I have heard, to disclaim, the understanding of the Senator from Vermont. So far from his report being a dog-in-the-manger report, if I have read it aright, he makes no objection to this property being used in the way and under the circumstances proposed. He only says that he wants a portion of the consideration money to come to the United States; not even, if I understand it, to enlarge that consideration money, but to have the United States share in it. That is no dog-in-the-manger policy, and therefore the remark can have no possible reference, I submit, to the honorable Senator or to his minority report.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not feel hurt by whatever application could be made of the remark, although I certainly understood it in that sense, or I should not have referred to it, because it is of no possible consequence to the Senate, I suppose, what may be the particular attitude in which I may happen to be viewed by anybody, and it is not of very great consequence probably to the public at large. I shall try to do my small duty in the best way I can.

It strikes me, on the main question about the price for which this is to be sold, that if a man who has a right of way across my farm, that I have granted to him and agreed that I will put no buildings upon that property, although I may raise, if I choose, as the United States may, potatoes or cabbages for the Chicago market upon it, afterward comes to me and says, as the city of Chicago does to Congress now, "I have got a right to have you keep that ground open, and I have a right to pass over it and across it, and to have a view over it, but I have found a man who is willing to put up a grist-mill for the benefit of all this farming neighborhood on that very spot, and I can get $10,000 for these five acres of land if I only owned it to sell to him; I cannot sell him my right of passage for a grist-mill because a grist-mill cannot be built on a right to cross or a right to view; those foundations would not be very good as you may imagine. Now, just give up to me the title to the property and I will sell it for the grist-mill. My title is as barren of value as a purpose of sale as yours is; you cannot sell it for a grist-mill and get anything for it for the reason that the man having bought the land would have no right to put up the grist-mill. I cannot sell my interest, and that is the right to pass over, for anything because the man who bought the right to pass over just as if he had bought your land without my consent could not have any right to put up a grist-mill." As I look at it, with great respect to the majority of the committee, (I must probably presume that I am wrong and that the Senate will think I am,) that is a fair statement of the case. The city of Chicago, if it represents the public, the abutters if they represent their private rights, as of course they do, have a property interest in the nature of an easement over this property, I will assume, and I think they have. That property interest is not worth a dollar. They could not sell it for a dollar to any human being altogether or separately. The United States always has owned the land itself. It could not sell the land probably for a dollar, I will assume, for the reason that the man who bought it could not make any use of it except to plant potatoes and cabbages; he could not build upon it; he could not devote it to any practical business use in the city.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Who would object to the use, the adjoining proprietors?

Mr. EDMUNDS. They would object, they say; although it is said, and I believe truly, as I have stated in the very brief statement of views that I submitted, that the owners of this adjoining property, the lots around it, would have their property increased in value by building it up for any kind of a commercial business purpose. It is right at the mouth of the river, in the heart now of the great tumult of activity that belongs to the city. Their property would be increased in value 25 or 30 per cent., I have not the least doubt; yet they have a right probably to stand up and say "we have got this right of view, and unless we can be paid we will not give up the right;" and that it is not an answer, and I doubt if it is, to say "it will be a benefit to you," because if it be an absolute right of view or passage, if we care anything about the property of private citizens, we cannot deprive them of it unless it be done under a State law or a United States law of condemnation for public purposes, which is outside of this measure.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator from Vermont permit me to ask him a question? Then I understand that his amendment will apply as well to the rights of the adjoining proprietors of this property as to the Valentine claim?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Most certainly.

Mr. THURMAN. But they are already provided for.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No. My friend from Ohio, with great respect, I fear is mistaken about that. The bill not only provides that we merely release whatever right the United States has in it (if it stopped there they would be provided for) but it says that the consent, which is merely another word for authority, of the United States is given to this grantee to devote that property to a different use from that to which it is now subjected, if three-fourths of the abutters are willing to consent. Suppose the other fourth are not, how are their rights protected? If they sue, here comes the act of Congress which says that Congress had the dominating authority over this property, it has chosen to authorize this change whether you, one-fourth, consent or not. I wish to make a general provision, not merely as to Valentine, although I will say as to Valentine, as I have said before, without any present belief in the validity of his claim, I think that the Constitution has not authorized me to denounce it and condemn it in this way when he has suits pending in the judicial courts of the United States to assert it. Therefore I say that I think the Senate not only as in respect to him but as in respect to every man there, and there are a great many interests, and every corporation, and there are a great many of those, ought to say that we do not intend by this action of ours to deprive any man of whatever the law now gives him. That is what we are most careful to say in all other bills. I know the respect that is due great corporations, such as were referred to this morning in the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois; but whatever the Senate does in respect of this sale, and as I have no expectation to preserve to the United States any share in this property, which as it is is good for nothing to them and as it is good for nothing to other people who are going to get the money for it, I did suppose that the amendment which I have now offered would be satisfactory to the chairman of the committee and to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I much prefer to vote upon the question rather than to detain the Senate by any argument; but I desire to call the attention of the Senate to one suggestion made by the Senator from Vermont. He says that the city of Chicago could not sell this land without the consent of the Government for any sum of money, nor could they derive any benefit from it. The reason for that is that the Government of the United States has the fee in the soil. True, the fee is in the Government, but the dedication of the land by the Government for the use expressed deprives the Government from any right that is of any value to it in the sense of obtaining any consideration for it. The Senator from Vermont says the city of Chicago could not sell it for any sum of money. Neither could the Government of the United States; and the only interest the Government of the United States has in this property is simply the fee, as I have stated, without the power to sell or lease or to do anything with it except that it may consent to change the use. That is all there is in this proposition, and all the question there is in this bill.

I must confess that I have been somewhat surprised to see the opposition made to it, and the remarks that have been made outside of this Chamber, when it is a proposition consented to by nearly everybody in the city of Chicago as well as the State of Illinois. It is desired on the part of a large majority of the people represented by my colleague and myself. There are but two reasons that would ordinarily be urged by some people for not changing this use. One is the reason that would be given by the gentlemen who are attorneys for the Valentine-scrip location, as it is called, and the other one, which the Senator from Vermont has not had brought to his notice, but which I will now do, and that is the pleasure of one of the Chicago base-ball clubs—the only use the ground is now put to, which may or may not be an important matter to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. CONKLING. Is that a base-ball club?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, a base-ball club. The ground is sometimes used for large political meetings that gather on these lots that are fenced in for the use of the base-ball club. This is the only use made of it except merely to allow the people to look over it or across it on the beauties of the lake. The park which is used for the benefit of the public is south of Madison street, and on which rests the exposition building.

I do not wish to discuss the legal proposition which has been discussed so ably on both sides. My colleague has made a report which covers the whole question, so far as the legal aspect of the case is concerned, as well as the justice of the case. I did not wish to say anything which would improperly characterize the opposition of persons outside who desire to defeat this bill; but their opposition is not in the interest of the public; it is not in the interest of the city of Chicago; it is not in the interest of the people of Illinois; it is not in the interest of the people generally; but this bill is in the interest of the general public, and is one which will be beneficial to the whole country, and certainly can be no detriment to any one.

So far as the provisions of the bill in reference to the rights of individuals are concerned, all rights are protected. It was well said by the Senator from Arkansas that Congress has not power to-day to legislate the right any individual has lawfully acquired out of his hands. All the legislation that could be passed by Congress could not affect the rights of individuals which lawfully exist in this property, if they have any rights. Their rights would be pressed to the courts. So I think the amendment proposed is an immaterial one, and performs no office except merely the one suggested by the protest, a mere naked suggestion that there might rest in some far-reaching imagination a mere possibility of some hidden, mysterious claim that may have floated over this property. Sir, this bill is a proper one, and as now amended is ample to protect all rights that may exist, and I hope it will pass without further amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. INGALLS. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont is so obviously right and so entirely in accordance with the law as it now exists, as I understand it, that I should hesitate to vote against it were it not for the fact that I am confident it would not change the status of any of the parties concerned in the bill. The fifth article of amendment to the Constitution provides that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; and I think the courts have repeatedly held that a legislative enactment is not due process of law. I shall therefore vote against the amendment.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MORRILL, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE.]

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 9, nays 39; as follows:

So the amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 362) to authorize the printing of 50,000 copies of special report of the Commissioner of Agriculture, relative to diseases of swine and infectious and contagious diseases incident to other domestic animals, and the joint resolution (H. R. No. 364) providing for the printing of reports of the Smithsonian Institution, and for other purposes, were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

REVOLUTIONARY BATTLEFIELDS.

Mr. RANDOLPH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1805) relative to revolutionary battlefields, reported in lieu of it a bill (S. No. 2126) relative to revolutionary battle-fields, &c.; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. COCKRELL. I wish to say that that report is not unanimous.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. KERNAN, it was Ordered. That James L. Casey be permitted to withdraw from the files of the Senate the papers in his pension claim, copies of the same being left on file.

THE GENEVA AWARD.

Mr. GARLAND. I desire to correct the record. Last Monday when I reported from the Committee on the Judiciary the Geneva award bill, by mistake I suppose in my own statement of the matter, the bill that was introduced by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] was indefinitely postponed. The order should be that it go on the Calendar and that the bill of the committee be regarded as a substitute in the nature of an amendment. I wish to correct the record by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That correction will be made if there be no objection.

LANDS IN SEVERALTY TO INDIANS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1773) to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians on the various reservations and to extend the protection of the laws of the States and Territories over the Indians, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. MORGAN.]

The Chief Clerk read the amendment submitted by Mr. MORGAN, as follows:

Add as a new section:

SEC. 10. That the Secretary of the Interior shall cause to be established at each Indian agency on the reservations included in the provisions of section 1 of this act a system of continuous registration of the members of each tribe by families, as the family is recognized in civilized society: Provided, That where the head of any family is a husband having more than one wife, such wives shall be registered in the order in which they were taken in marriage; and all such wives of the polygamic family shall inherit property as daughters; but after the first registration no man shall have registered more than one living wife; and all polygamic marriages contracted subsequent to the first registration shall be void for all the purposes of registration and inheritance under the provisions of this act.

Mr. INGALLS. Why does the Senator from Alabama attempt to establish the relationship of father and daughter between the polygamous wives, rather than daughter and parent, or grandmother, or cousin, or aunt?

Mr. MORGAN. When the head of an Indian family who has received a patent for land and who is made a citizen of the State or Territory in which he lives dies, the inheritance of some of these wives under the laws of the State or Territory may be attended with very great difficulties under the bill as it stands.

Mr. INGALLS. Why, Mr. President, the bill provides that each member of a family other than the head, as I understand it, shall be entitled to one-eighth of a section, without attempting to discriminate between wives, or daughters, or any other relatives. It seems to me that the amendment is very objectionable in the first place as recognizing the validity and sanctioning the legality of these relationships that ought not to be recognized at all. And in the second place it is unnecessary because being members of the Indian's family they are already provided for in the existing provisions of the bill.

Mr. MORGAN. They are already provided for in the bill in reference to land to which a head-right is given, but no provision is made in reference to lands taken by the head of the family when the laws of the Territory or State shall operate after the death of the Indian for the transmission of these lands to his or her heirs. The laws of descents and distribution of the different States are adopted by the bill as being the law which must govern in the disposal of this property after the death of the Indian. It is, therefore, necessary to provide some law by which several wives may be enabled to inherit from the head of the family, unless we intend to cut them off entirely. I submit to the honorable Senator from Kansas, however, that we recognize practically the polygamous relation among the Indians. We have no law prohibiting polygamy among them and we recognize the Indian governments in all these tribes as between themselves; we have done so in numerous instances, both in criminal and civil matters; therefore it is necessary, when we transfer them to a different jurisdiction on the establishment of civilization, that we should do so under such conditions as will enable them to inherit from each other without embarrassment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. TELLER. I move to amend, in section 6, line 6, after the word "reside," by inserting:

Provided, That no Indian shall be punished for polygamy who, at the time of such allotment, was practicing the same in accordance with the usage or custom of the tribe to which he belonged.

Mr. ALLISON. There is no provision in this bill for punishing anybody.

Mr. TELLER. The provision of the bill is that they shall be subject to the State laws, and the laws of the States punish polygamy. Therefore, unless you intend to punish the Indians who are now practicing polygamy in accordance with their laws and their religious ideas the moment they become the owners of land by allotment, this ought to be put in. They are subject to the State laws from the moment the land is allotted to them, and those who are not within the States but are within the Indian Territory are to be subject, according to the chairman's statement yesterday, to the laws of Kansas, and the laws of Kansas do not allow a man to have more than one wife, and as we learned from the Senator from Kansas yesterday that very many of the Indians have two wives, I do not see that the committee can object to the amendment.

Mr. COKE. I have not consulted with any other member of the committee; but so far as I am concerned, I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to ask the Senator from Colorado whether, if I understood his explanation, this is an amendment which limits the power of State courts to punish offenses against their laws; and if so, whether we can do it?

Mr. TELLER. We provide in section 6 that Indians to whom allotments are made shall be subject to the laws, both civil and criminal, of the State or Territory in which they may reside. Many of these Indians have a plurality of wives. These wives that they have been married to in accordance with the Indian law, I think they should be allowed to keep if they see fit. If you do not, you will not have any allotments to that class of Indians, unless they take them in ignorance of what they are to suffer. I am asking, in reference to these Indians, just what the early Christian Church allowed to its converts. In the very earliest times, when the heathen who had a plurality of wives in accordance with the customs of the country joined the church, he was not required to put them away. I do not think these Indians ought to be required to put away their wives. They ought to be prohibited from marrying any more, but not from keeping those they have already married.

Mr. HOAR. My point I did not make clear to my friend from Colorado. I suppose that Indians upon a reservation in the tribal relation are not within the jurisdiction of the criminal laws of a State. An act of Congress may undoubtedly take away that shield, may destroy the tribal relation, and very likely do what this statute in express terms undertakes to do—that is, subject the Indian to State law; but it is not because the United States have any authority in the world to extend the operations of State law over anybody. They cannot enact whom the State may punish, whom it may take jurisdiction over—that depends on the State constitution and laws—except by the removal of this barrier, just as they admit a foreigner by naturalization; and the moment he is naturalized he is subject to the State laws that apply to citizens. But having done that, we certainly, as it seems to me, have no constitutional authority to say that a State shall not punish an offense committed by anybody who for any reason is subject to it. We could not in a naturalization law say that Turks should be admitted to be naturalized citizens hereafter, but that they should not be punished by the law of any State for polygamy or adultery if they brought over their plural wives with them. So if you make an Indian subject to the law of the State, it is not by limiting or by extending the operation of that law; it is by taking away from the Indian the tribal character; but you cannot constitutionally take away from the Indian the tribal character and say, provided, however, that a certain fact shall be hereafter a defense to him against the State law which is not a defense to anybody else.

Mr. TELLER. The chairman of the committee announced that it was not the purpose of this bill to destroy the tribal relation. I differed with the committee, and thought it did destroy the tribal relation; but if it does not destroy the tribal relation, then my amendment ought to be adopted, because then the shield may be partially withdrawn or wholly withdrawn at the will of the Government. The Government may say, we will allow you to punish for a certain character of offenses, and for a certain other character of offenses we will not. Of course if the tribal relation is absolutely annulled, then I think there is point in the suggestion made by the Senator from Massachusetts; but the bill proceeds upon the theory that the tribal relation is not dissolved. I understand the chairman says he accepts the amendment.

Mr. COKE. I understand that for polygamous practices in accordance with the laws and customs of the tribes occurring anterior to the date of the allotments there is no punishment under this amendment.

Mr. TELLER. That is it.

Mr. COKE. With that understanding I see no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. COCKRELL in the chair.) If there is no objection the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will put the question on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VEST. I offer the following amendment: after the word "provided," in line 19 of section 5, insert:

And the laws of the State of Kansas regulating the descent, alienation, partition, and distribution of real estate shall, so far as practicable, apply to all lands in the Indian Territory which may be allotted in severalty under the provisions of this act.

Mr. MORGAN. I should like to have the honorable Senator explain what is meant by "so far as practicable." I do not understand that language.

Mr. VEST. We extend to the Indians in the Indian Territory the laws of descent provided for by the State of Kansas wherever these statutes can be practically operative as to descents between father and child, as to the partition of estates, &c., and I think they should apply in the Indian Territory. I prefer that the laws of the State of Kansas should apply to this land, because Kansas extends along the border of the Indian Territory for a much longer distance than any other State. The State of Arkansas and the State of Missouri both adjoin this Territory, but the State of Kansas borders for a longer distance upon the Territory than they do.

Mr. MORGAN. I suppose by the substitution of the word "applicable" for "practicable" it would come nearer the idea.

Mr. VEST. I used the word "practicable" because it was doubtful whether "applicable" would be sufficient. These laws are to operate in so far as they can be put into actual practice.

I have heard a good deal from the Senator from Alabama upon the subject of polygamy. I do not think we ought now to legislate on that subject. It is a very serious one. Whether the Government of the United States has recognized it as a sort of a religion in the Indian Territory, or not, I shall not now discuss. At any rate I do not choose to take any legislative action on the subject now. I believe it does exist in some of these tribes, and if it does I only propose to apply to it as far as I can the statutes of civilization.

Mr. MORGAN. As I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, I am compelled to confess that I do not know what I am voting for, for I have not studied the laws of Kansas, nor the laws of Arkansas or Missouri or Texas, or any of the neighboring States, to determine what laws we are imposing on these Indians in the distribution of their property and the descent of their real estate. We are compelled to act in the dark. I suppose the honorable Senator from Kansas, if he would explain the whole system of laws of that State, might be able to satisfy the Senate that it was a better system than the system of any contiguous State or any system we might adopt ourselves; but I think we are rushing rather headlong and rashly into this great question to undertake to provide for so large a Territory as the Indian Territory, with the enormous population that is there and that is to assemble there hereafter, what shall be the law of descent and distribution, when I think the large majority of the Senators have not had a moment's time for the consideration of this question, and do not know anything about it. I cannot force myself to vote for a law of this magnitude and this importance without having at least some information and some time to inform myself as to what the law is on which my vote is to be taken.

Mr. VEST. The laws of the State of Kansas are about like those of my own State and all the Western States in regard to descent and distribution—father, mother, brothers and sisters and their descendants. If there is any Western State that has any other law of descent, I am not aware of it. They may differ in some provisions, but without having carefully examined the statutes of Kansas I have no doubt that is the system.

Mr. PLUMB. I think the proposition of the Senator from Missouri simply extends the rule already laid down in the bill by the second section, which provides that these Indians in all their rights and so on shall be subject to the laws, civil as well as criminal, of the Territories and States in which they happen to be situated. This is simply extending the laws of the State of Kansas not only over the Indians within its limits, but similarly over the Indians in the Indian Territory. We are not here to inquire whether or not the laws of the States and Territories in which these Indians live are such as we should adopt for them if we had that to do, but we simply say as the Indians are there they shall be content with the laws made for white men, executed by white men, and under which white men enjoy their rights. That is just what is said by the amendment of the Senator from Missouri upon this particular point.

While I am not here to defend the laws of the State of Kansas, I can only say that the people of Kansas get along very well under them, and I think on the whole they are good enough for the Indians in the Indian Territory, or any other Indians.

Mr. MORGAN. If we knew what they were we could probably determine whether they were good or not, but I do not know that they are any better for the Indians than the laws of Texas. A Senator says, "any of them are good enough." That is about the principle of this matter, that anything is good enough for an Indian without our knowing what it is. Anything at all is good enough for him, and yet the Senator from Kansas has not told us what the laws of descent in Kansas are.

Mr. PLUMB. I do not care to unfold the volume of statutes and take up the time of the Senate, but if the Senator is desirous of knowing precisely what that statute is I will refer him to the Library, where he can get the volume and read it.

Mr. MORGAN. I cannot afford to leave the Senate Chamber while this bill is under consideration to go to the Library to hunt up a subject that I do not know anything about, and perhaps it might take me a week to understand it if I had access to the proper books.

One section of this bill gives to the Indians the benefit, if you may so term it, of the laws of the States and Territories in which they are found. There is some principle in that. A man ought to be governed by the laws of the Territory in which he is found when he is brought within the reach of the power of the law of the United States, whether it is local or general; but when you undertake to extend over that man the law of a territory in which he is not found it is becoming on the part of a deliberative body like this to understand what the law is that we propose to impose upon him, and whether it is applicable in its provisions and in its principles to the Indians of that territory. The Senator from Kansas says the people of Kansas get along well enough under their laws. I see that they do, but the answer is that the people of Kansas are not Indians. Perhaps there may be some other system of laws in Texas or elsewhere under which Indians could get along better than they could under the laws of Kansas. I think the Indians have been removed out of Kansas pretty rapidly; not many of them remain there now entitled to reservations. Many of them have been sent off to the Indian Territory, and I suppose the people of Kansas instead of conforming their laws to the condition of the Indians have so framed them as to get rid of the Indians and adapt them to the white civilization and not to Indian civilization.

I think we are pushing this measure with too much haste, and by the time we get through with it we shall have a web that it will take a great many years to unravel unless we repeal it the next session of Congress.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The subject of the treatment of Indians is a subject about which I know nothing at all, and I confess with frankness after hearing discussions for nearly ten years in this Chamber on the subject of how best to manage the Indian tribes of this country, that I have never yet seen any man who knew much more about it than I did myself.

Now, in reference to this particular amendment I do not know whether it would be a proper amendment or not. It is an attempt, just as this whole bill is an attempt, to apply laws which are proper and fitting for civilized life to a class of people who possess but very little civilization and some of whom are barbarous and savage.

The theory upon which the whole bill is constructed is that it is best to assign to the Indians lands in severalty. If this was a proposition to be applied to men possessing civilization, capable of the maintenance of the rights of civilized beings, it would be a proper theory; but whether it is a practical bill as applied to savages is a very grave question. But yet this proposition proposes to apply that principle, that theory, to the Indian tribes of this country, without any reference to the degree of civilization which any of these tribes may have reached. I believe it is generally understood that some of the Indians are much more civilized than others; some are inclined to pursue settled lives, to have homes, while others roam the forest at pleasure, subsisting by hunting and fishing, know nothing of the attachments of locality, which generally influence the lives and acts of civilized men and of the Indian tribes who possess some civilization; and yet this is an attempt to apply the same theory, the theory of assigning lands in severalty, not only to Indians, but to Indians of every degree of civilization. The proposition is that whenever the President of the United States shall ascertain that an Indian reservation is adapted to agriculture, then there shall be a process to divide the lands in severalty to the members of the Indian tribes.

Mr. COKE. "The President be, and he hereby is, authorized"—not "required"—"authorized, whenever in his opinion any reservation of such Indians is advantageous for agricultural purposes, to cause said reservation to be surveyed or resurveyed, if necessary, and to allot the lands in said reservation in severalty to the Indians located thereon."

Mr. SAULSBURY. That is true. Whenever the lands are adapted to agricultural purposes you invest in the President of the United States the power and authority to allot these lands in severalty to the Indian tribes. It is character and condition of the lands that becomes the test for the President. There is nothing here that vests the President with discretion as to the character of the Indians, but it authorizes him, upon being satisfied that the lands are adapted to agricultural purposes, to proceed to divide these lands and assign them in severalty to the Indians. If the theory itself is right, then the President ought to be authorized, when in his judgment a degree of civilization has been reached in any tribe to warrant and justify such an allotment, to proceed to make the allotment; but there is nothing of that kind. If you say the discretion is invested by the bill in that regard, certainly it is implied discretion, for there is no express discretion given in that regard.

But after doing that, after determining first that the Indians shall have land assigned to them, you then come to the further provision of this bill, that the Indians themselves must determine the question. Whenever that is done a man who desires this allotment to take place in order that he may make some money out of it will not have much difficulty in getting the consent of the Indians to a proposition of that character. I fear that unless we pass this bill upon the theory that there must be a certain degree of civilization of the Indian tribes, and a certain amount of intelligence possessed by them in reference to their rights, by this process we are subjecting the Indians to be deprived of their rights by parties who may seek to deprive them or get the advantage of them in some way.

I perhaps shall vote for this bill because it has had the consideration of an intelligent committee of this body, not, however, because I am satisfied it is right; I shall have to yield my judgment to that of the committee; but I now take this occasion to express my doubt as to the practicability and the wisdom of this bill or of the theory upon which it is based. That it would be proper to allow Indians possessing a proper degree of civilization to hold land in severalty, I do not question; I believe that will prove ultimately to be one of the means of the civilization of these people by getting them settled on their own lands, giving them the advantage of locality which all men of civilization possess; but I do doubt, gravely doubt, whether it is practicable or proper to attempt to apply the principles of this bill to every description of Indians in this broad land or to all who are settled on reservations.

I simply rose to say this much, because I am about to vote on this bill, but I want it understood that I vote for it simply because the committee of this body who have been intrusted with the consideration of this measure have given it their deliberate consideration and have come to the conclusion that it is proper, and not because in my judgment it is practicable.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Mr. President, I do not know that I can throw any light upon this matter. I have not been specially charged with the management of Indian affairs in this body by reason of my connection with any of the standing committees; but my assignment to a special committee, of which I have been a member for the last eighteen months, has compelled me to study the question to some extent, and I confess I am at some loss to know what is the best thing to do with this bill. I would like to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs to section 5. The scope of the bill generally is this: when two-thirds of the Indians of any tribe consent to it, the members of the tribe may select certain quantities of land, as provided in the bill, and hold them in severalty, receiving patents for them. If they take those lands, not in a block, but as they probably will, one Indian making a selection here and another there, leaving unselected portions of land between their selections, what then? The remaining portion of the bill provides that the unselected lands may be sold by the Government, and the money applied to the use of the Indians. What will probably be the effect of that? The unselected lands lying between those selected by the Indians will be bought by white men and settled on by them, leaving an Indian farm upon one side and the other side and a white man's farm between, thus dotting the reservation over in that way with farms held by Indians and held by white men.

Now, the question I want to ask of the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs is, has that committee carefully considered the probable effect of that condition of affairs? It is well known, and unfortunately so, that all white men are not good men, and it is supposed by some people living in the eastern part of our country that that is especially true of western white men. Whether that be correct or not, I am not disposed here now to question. But suppose that the parcels unselected by the Indians shall be sold and settled upon by white men, and those white men should be occasionally men who drink or sell whisky, to which unfortunately the Indians as well as the whites are addicted, or they should be white men having other bad habits as well, has the Indian Committee carefully considered whether or not in providing, as I understand this bill does, for that condition of affairs, they are in reality not providing for the advancement of the Indians? If the selections to be made by them were to be made in block so that they appropriated all or a portion of their reservation, leaving a portion to be sold outside, it would not have the necessary effect of introducing white farmers among them; and that would relieve me somewhat of my embarrassment.

I propose to submit to the chairman of the committee this amendment and ask him what he would conceive of the propriety of having it made: In section 5, commencing on line 19, strike out all after the word "further" in line 19, down to and including the word "tribe" in line 23, and insert these words:

That at any time after lands have been allotted to all the Indians of any tribe as herein provided, it shall be lawful for the Secretary of the Interior to negotiate with such Indian tribe for the purchase of such portion of the reservation that has not been allotted as such tribe from time to time may consent to sell.

That language would leave it optional with the tribes not to sell these parcels of land interposed between the selections made by the Indians. It would not compel them to sell all the unselected land at one time. It would enable them to sell a portion of the reservation in which there were no allotments made to Indians, reserving those portions lying between the allotments made to Indians. That would relieve me to some extent of the embarassment I feel in voting for this bill.

If I have made myself understood, I shall be glad to hear from the chairman of the committee what he thinks about it.

Mr. COKE. I think I understand the Senator from Iowa. So far as I am permitted to speak of what took place in the committee, I can say that this subject has been discussed among the members of the committee, and while I do not remember any specific agreement arrived at between them on the subject, I know that the bill was reported with the understanding that the conditions stated by the Senator from Iowa might exist, to wit, that the Indians might select their lands on different portions of the reservation, leaving unselected intervals which would become public land. Such was my understanding, and I think the record of the debate on the Ute bill shows that that was the understanding with reference to the agreement provided for in that bill. I have had no opportunity of consulting other members of the committee in reference to the amendment proposed by the honorable Senator from Iowa. I do not feel prepared to accept it unless it shall be deemed advisable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. COCKRELL in the chair.) The question now before the Senate is the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. VEST.] It is not in order to entertain the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KIRKWOOD] until the amendment of the Senator from Missouri is disposed of, as it is not an amendment to the amendment. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. Now I hope the amendment of my colleague will be read.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I offer it, and if the Senate will indulge me I will endeavor again to explain very briefly just what I mean. Let my amendment be first read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment of Mr. KIRKWOOD, which was after the word "further," in section 5, line 9, to strike out all down to and including the word "tribe," in line 23, and to insert:

That at any time after lands have been allotted to all the Indians of any tribe as herein provided, it shall be lawful for the Secretary of the Interior to negotiate with such Indian tribe for the purchase of such portions of its reservation as have not been allotted as such tribe shall from time to time consent to sell.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. My idea, Mr. President, and I would be glad if it is not asking too much to have the attention of Senators to it for a moment, is this: if the amendment prevails, the sale of any portion of a reservation will not be had until the Indians have selected for themselves, to be held in severalty by them, the portions that they are entitled to select under this bill. If in making those selections they leave scattered around among them small parcels that might be settled upon by other persons, and a large body outside of their selections, I propose that it shall be legitimate and proper for them to retain these small portions lying interspersed among their farms in their own name and hold them without sale, so as to prevent the settlement in among them, for a good many years to come at least, of white settlers, leaving them at liberty to sell, if they desire to sell, any land outside their selection that might be sold without mingling among them white settlers. That is the purpose of it, and therefore I insert the language that these negotiations may be for sales from time to time of such portions of the unselected land as they may choose to offer for sale.

I can make it perfectly plain, I think; I know it is plain to myself. For instance, suppose a reservation consists of 100,000 acres, and under this bill the Indians taking detached parcels in the south half, or north half, or west half, or east half of their reservation select 40,000 acres, leaving 60,000 on which they have not settled. Of those 60,000 acres 10,000 are interspersed in small lots among the selections they have made and 50,000 lie outside in a block. I think it is wiser for them to retain the 10,000 acres interspersed among the selections made by them, and not to permit those lands to be sold to and settled by white men, at least until they have advanced further than they are already advanced in civilization. While I would authorize them to negotiate for a sale of that lying outside of their selections if they saw fit to do so, I should be disinclined to encourage the sale of these detached portions lying between the selections. It brings to my mind a fable I read when I was a boy. I learned a good deal by reading fables then.

Somewhere I read of the fable that at the time of high water in a stream, a vase of brass and a vase of earthenware were floating down the stream not far from each other, and the brazen vessel, using language, as inanimate objects may in fable, desired a nearer approach to it on the part of the earthenware vessel, desired to be sociable, wanted them to come closer together and get in closer contact with each other. The invitation was renewed repeatedly; but the earthenware vessel, after awhile, very respectfully declining to approach any nearer, said that while it might be very agreeable to the brazen vessel to have a nearer contact, that contact might be fatal to the earthenware vessel. There is something of that, I am afraid, in this bringing the white man and the Indian into close contact with each other. It would make this bill much more palatable to me if the amendment I have offered, which does not stand in the way of the general principle involved in the bill, could be adopted.

I will say another thing while I am up, and relieve the Senate then from any further trespass on my part. In thinking this matter over I have thought that we are not beginning at the right end precisely in this bill. If my advice had been embodied in this bill, I would have provided for something like this condition of things: I can illustrate what I mean by two tribes in Nebraska, the Omahas and the Winnebagoes. They are both quite well advanced for Indians in civilization. The fear they have to-day, the fear that haunts them every day, is that they may be at some future time dispossessed of their reservation, they holding either by executive order or by treaty the land they do hold; and the fear that that may come prevents many of them from going forward and making farms and improvements. In case they should by any means be compelled to leave their land, it would force upon them the alternative either of abandoning their tribe or abandoning the improvements they had made. I think if we gave to certain of the tribes, like the Winnebagoes and the Omahas and the Poncas, a title—by that I mean a title in fee—to their reservation, so that they would know when they made their selections of their farms that they could hold them as against all the world, we should be moving more rapidly in the direction we want to go than we shall under this bill. If they had the same title to their land that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] and I have to our land, they would not depend upon Congress for the protection of it, but upon the courts of the country.

Mr. DAWES. My colleague upon the Ponca committee knows, I think, that that is the experience of the Poncas, I am sorry to say. When the Government granted to the Poncas their land by metes and bounds, they did have a title to it; but the United States does not treat them as if they had a title to it.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I do not understand that they have a title to it such as the Senator from Massachusetts has to his and I have to my land. I may be mistaken in that.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator is a good lawyer, and I ask him if he had no other title to his farm than a deed which contained these operative words by metes and bounds "for a consideration I cede and relinquish the following tract of land to the Senator from Iowa," does he not think he would have a title to hold his lands?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I can very well imagine that the Senator from Massachusetts has been so absorbed in the matter of the Ponca Indians for some time past that it is impossible for him to consider any question connected with Indians without connecting it with the Poncas. The time may come when the question that he suggests to me may be discussed before the Senate, and it may be that when that time shall come I shall have something to say upon it. It is sufficient to say in the mean time that that question has been referred to our law committee, something over a year ago, the Judiciary Committee of this body, composed of as able lawyers as there are in it, whether more able lawyers than the Senator from Massachusetts I will not say, but certainly much more able lawyers than I am, and when they shall have made their report——

Mr. DAWES. What was referred to them?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. The question of the validity of the title of the Poncas. Then either the Senator from Massachusetts or myself will be seen to be in error. Knowing how very right he almost always is, I am inclined to think that the error is on my part and not on his; and yet he may be mistaken and I may be right by possibility.

Mr. DAWES. Having drawn that resolution myself, I ought to know something about it. The inquiry ordered was not whether they had a title to their lands, but whether they had any means of enforcing their title.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I think the one question is involved in the other.

Mr. DAWES. And the committee have slept on it for now over a year; and that is not very consoling to the Poncas.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I think it would be difficult to consider one of those questions without considering the other; but that is outside of the matter we are considering now. I was suggesting to the chairman of the Indian Committee whether it would not have been wiser originally to have provided in this bill to give to such tribes as the President of the United States might deem it wise to do, an absolute title to their reservations, or such portions as he and the Indians might agree upon, so that the preservation of the title would not rest in the discretion of Congress, or the whim of Congress, or the justice or injustice of Congress, but would rest with the courts upon which we all depend for the preservation of our property, as well as of our lives and liberties. Having thus assured to them that if they chose to take lands in severalty and make farms upon them, they could not be disturbed, and would not be compelled to choose at any future time between the abandonment of the tribe to which they belonged or the abandonment of the improvements they had made, I think they would be much more surely encouraged to make selections and make improvements upon them.

I have but to say further that the amendment I have offered, while I am not at all tenacious about it, would relieve my own mind to some considerable extent of the difficulty I feel in voting for this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. KIRKWOOD.]

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. I move to amend by inserting in line 5, at the end of section 8, after the word "dollars:"

The Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to select, with the consent of the parents or guardians, any number not exceeding fifty Indian boys, between the ages of twelve and twenty years, and to send them to the Agricultural College of Colorado, at Fort Collins, Colorado, there to be instructed in the primary branches of an English education and agriculture, where special instructions shall be given to such pupils in agriculture by irrigation.

In a very large proportion of the western country occupied by these Indians it is impossible to farm, except by irrigation. You may take the Indian children from that region—I will take New Mexico, Arizona, Colorado, Southern Utah, Southern California, and Nevada—and bring them to Hampton and Carlisle, and instruct them in all the branches of agriculture, as practiced in this country, and they will go back ignorant of the very first principle of agriculture.

The question of irrigation is one that has greatly disturbed even the intelligent white men of that country for many years. It was a long time before the white men learned the true theory of putting on the water and irrigating their land. It was not until within a few years that the people learned just how much water to put on, just when to put it on, and in what manner and method it should be put on. Now we have an agricultural college at Fort Collins where there is a two-hundred-acre farm where are raised all sorts of crops that are cultivated in that region of country.

This amendment is not imperative on the Secretary; it only allows him to do this if in his judgment the necessities of the Indians demand it; and there they can send these children, there they can learn that peculiar agriculture which they must some time, if they are ever farmers where they live, understand. If they farm in the regions that I have named they have some day to learn the system of irrigation. I have not made it obligatory; the Secretary may do it or he may not as he sees fit. It seems to me the committee cannot object to the amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. It is what we want.

Mr. TELLER. If the committee say they will not object to it, I shall say nothing further about it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. TELLER.]

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. I offer the following amendment: In section 1, line 13, after the word "section," insert "and in addition one section of land adapted to grazing, to be set apart by the locating agent hereinafter mentioned."

That provision is to apply to that part of the bill which relates to locations in favor of the heads of families. Those familiar with the western country know very well that to set apart to an Indian one-fourth, or one-eighth, or one-sixth of a section of this land amounts to no contribution to his prosperity at all. Less than a section of land to the head of a family for grazing purposes is really of no value, and the object of the amendment is to authorize the Secretary, in addition to the quarter section of agricultural lands set apart to the head of a family, to set apart a section of grazing land.

Mr. SLATER. I hope that amendment will not be adopted. One of the gravest and most serious objections to the bill is that it gives too much land now to Indians. The great purpose of Indians in securing land at all is to have the opportunity of roaming and grazing ponies on lands that will furnish natural pasturage. If you restricted them to one-half what you now allow them in the bill, it would be much more valuable to the Indians and much better for the country in the end.

Mr. MORGAN. Then the Senator from Oregon ought to oppose the bill, if that be his view of it, because in the first section he will find this provision:

And provided further, That where the lands on any reservation are mainly valuable for grazing purposes an additional allotment of such grazing lands, in quantities as above provided, shall be made to each individual.

The bill provides for setting apart grazing land to the Indians. I do not think their condition will be improved by giving the head of the family, to whom you allot a quarter-section of land, a section of grazing land for the benefit of the family. I do not think it is any objection to the roaming feature of this bill, of which the Senator complains, that we undertake to provide a square mile of land that he shall settle. The lands set apart to the Indians under this bill, if any should ever be set apart to an Indian under the bill, which I have no idea will ever take place, will be agricultural lands; and yet in grazing countries where men have to subsist mainly by grazing, we cut them off. An Indian head of a family on a quarter-section of grazing land or an Indian without a family on an eighth of a section and a minor child on the sixteenth of a section of grazing land cannot get along; and what will become of all the rest of the land as soon as the Indians are all located and the allotments are made? Of course the Indians will be brought together and the other lands will be sold, and no reservation of a sufficient quantity of land will ever be made; it cannot be made under this bill and the rest will be sold, and consequently the Indians will have to starve.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. WALLACE in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama. [Mr. MORGAN.]

The amendment was rejected—ayes 3, noes not counted.

Mr. MORGAN. I move to strike out the ninth section of the bill, and on that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. MORGAN. If members of this committee do not desire to present themselves before the country in a responsible way for the ninth section they can refuse the yeas and nays, that is all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will put the question again.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask that the ninth section be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The section will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. That the provisions of this act shall not extend to any tribe of Indians until the consent of two-thirds of the male members twenty-one years of age shall be first had and obtained.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I have no doubt that the Senator from Alabama could add new petitions by way of amendment to the Lord's Prayer which would be of great advantage to the Christian religion.

Mr. MORGAN. I would amend it if by amending it I could have any hope that the honorable Senator would be included in its benefits.

Mr. INGALLS. I have no doubt also that he could add new beatitudes to the Sermon on the Mount, new commandments to the Decalogue, and that in various ways he could contribute to the enlightenment and education of the human race; but why is it necessary to attempt to do everything on this bill?

Mr. MORGAN. I have objected to the bill because it attempted everything, and have been trying to amend it so that it will be capable of doing something.

Mr. INGALLS. The debate on this bill began on the 20th day of January, and has now been continuing for nearly two weeks. This delay has been induced very largely by the efforts of the Senator from Alabama and the Senator from Colorado, who have assiduously and sedulously assailed the committee as though they were attempting to enforce the exercise of some arbitrary and unconstitutional power in regard to the Indians, attempting to deprive them of their rights, and as if they were entirely without information on the subject the Senate has committed to their charge.

Now, Mr. President, I have no doubt that the Senators from Alabama and Colorado are entirely candid and ingenuous in the opposition they have offered to this bill and the amendments they have proposed; and I may say to them as one member of the committee, that I did not give my full assent to this bill. I agreed to its report with some misgivings, because I feared that it might not, even if adopted, bring about an Indian millennium.

Mr. MORGAN. Now, if the Senator will allow me, I will state to him that if he had obliged the Senate of the United States by making that declaration seven or eight days ago, the bill could have been passed long since.

Mr. INGALLS. I am unable to see what possible connection that can have with the subject under consideration. I was proceeding to say that I could not deny that the Indian problem was surrounded with difficulty, with a web of tangled and illogical absurdities; that from the beginning it had been tentative and experimental; that we had for two hundred years and more groped and stumbled, making experiments that had been abandoned, and that this was merely one more effort that had been honestly attempted by the Committee on Indian Affairs for the purpose of contributing as far as lay in our power to the solution of what everybody admits to be a question of the highest importance and of almost insurmountable difficulty.

I consented to the report of this bill, believing that in the main its measures were beneficent, hoping that it might contribute something toward solving this great problem. Instead of assisting the committee and endeavoring to unite with them in reaching some solution of these difficulties, we have been met at every step of the debate by the presentation of frivolous suggestions and untenable amendments, intended apparently to retard progress and to defeat the final adoption of the bill.

Mr. President, it has been said during the progress of this debate that this bill would result in the establishment of a landed aristocracy. Now, sir, the Indians to-day are the only unadulterated, genuine aristocracy in this country. They are a peculiar and chosen people, like the children of Israel, having hereditary titles and privileges; possessing vast untaxed areas of the public domain, over which they roam at will in savage pastime, and, like the old robber barons of the Rhine, levying tribute and exactions upon the private citizen and the public Treasury with equal success and with impartial rapacity. "They toil not, neither do they spin;" they pay no taxes; they are subject to no laws; they burn, murder, and plunder with impunity; they contribute nothing, and never have contributed anything whatever to the welfare of society. Yet they have for generations been maintained in insolent idleness or audacious hostility by the voluntary contribution of millions of money annually from the public revenues. This has not been because they do not possess the capacity and intelligence to maintain themselves, for they have on many occasions given abundant evidence of the possession of both. In many sanguinary wars their wild cavalry has matched the trained legions of the Republic. In diplomacy within a very short period they have shown a brilliant and shining capacity for lying that has never been surpassed, so far as I know, by any foreign minister or secretary of state.

Upon the untenanted wilderness of the West, exposed to the rigors and vicissitudes of an inhospitable climate, without seed-time or harvest, without trade or manufactures or commerce or agriculture or art, without tools or implements, without fabrics, without vehicles or machinery or permanent habitations, they have for centuries maintained a receding but almost insuperable barrier to the progress and advance of American civilization; so that at the expiration of more than two centuries of efforts to evangelize, to Christianize, to civilize, to exterminate, or to conquer, the American Indian presents the same characteristics and exhibits the same problem to-day as that which confronted the earliest colonists upon the rock-bound shores of Massachusetts Bay.

They are a persistent and enduring type. They are not a fugitive or transitory people. There is nothing about them of the pathos of a perishing race, for there are very nearly as many Indians on this continent now as when Miles Standish landed on that historic bowlder called Plymouth Rock. Notwithstanding the pathetic platitudes about extermination and the danger that the red man would soon vanish from the face of the earth, the stubborn fact remains that, in spite of diseases, wars, exposures, and migrations, there are very nearly as many Indians to-day as there were in 1620.

Now, what are you going to do with them? I ask the Senator from Alabama and the Senator from Colorado, who have been for days and weeks impeding the progress of this bill, what are you going to do with them? It is much easier to be a critic than to be an architect; it is much easier to pull down than to construct. I ask these gentlemen who are attempting to impede this bill, what do you propose to give in place of it?

Mr. MORGAN. If the honorable Senator will pardon me, if I felt toward the Indians as he has just expressed himself, I would commission butchers to go out and kill the last one of them.

Mr. INGALLS. I have expressed no sentiments of hostility or antagonism to the Indian. I have detailed history and narrated facts, and I challenge the Senator from Alabama or any other Senator to successfully dispute what I have alleged. I am not an advocate of butchery; I am in favor of some humane policy that shall relieve the Treasury from the annual imposition of millions of dollars to support these people in unproductive idleness, and I assented to the reporting of this bill in the hope that something might be done in that direction.

We are not traveling in a new path. We are not the pioneers of a new territory, for the British Government in dealing with the Indians of the Canadas has been for the last century engaged in precisely the same experiment that we are now trying. I heard the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. BROWN,] who is not now present, dwell with approbation on the humane methods adopted by the British in their government of the Indians. He forgot to say that the Indians in North America under the control of Great Britain had been by successive wars reduced to less than twenty thousand, that for generations the policy of vindictive and ferocious extermination had been pursued; and that now, after they had been reduced to comparative insignificance, the government was attempting precisely what we are trying to do, to civilize, and evangelize, and Christianize the remaining fragments, and in some way to evade the embarrassing results of this vexatious problem.

In pursuance of the same general line of policy indicated in this bill they have enacted four important statutes, the first in 1857 and the last in 1869, having in view the peaceable solution of the Indian problem. They have tried the allotment of lands in severalty; they have tried the system of giving lands to Indians in severalty on reservations, and these projects have all been definitively abandoned after trial as being incapable of successful accomplishment. They found that giving land to Indians in severalty resulted in the withdrawal from the tribal relations of the best and ablest members of the tribe.

Mr. TELLER, (in his seat.) Who found that out?

Mr. INGALLS. The British in North America found it out.

Mr. TELLER. They never gave their lands out.

Mr. INGALLS. They did give them out, and the Senator is as ignorant of history as he is of good manners in denying my statement in that way. In 1857 a statute to that effect was passed, which was after trial repealed, the result being that under the operations of the law the most industrious and intelligent members of the tribe withdrew themselves, and their withdrawal was followed by the intrusion of characterless whites, so that the condition of the tribe as a mass subsequently became lowered and degraded. They have also tried the allotment of land in severalty upon other conditions, and finally as the result of their experience they have come down to this, that whenever any Indian desires to be enfranchised the authorities examine him, and if satisfied with the result of their inquiry, he enters upon a probationary period of three years. At the expiration of three years, if he has exhibited the requisite capacity to manage his own affairs and possesses intelligence and good moral character he is definitely enfranchised, and a patent is issued giving him a life estate in a described tract of land within the limits of his reservation, which can be devised by will to his heirs. The Indians all remain sequestered, and white people are kept off the reservation. This system of qualified citizenship and enfranchisement, accompanied by life interest in certain prescribed limits of land, is what has been finally adopted by the British Government as the only solution of the Indian question so far as they are concerned.

In reporting this bill I acted in the light of the experience and observations I have had in the past, having been a member of the Indian Committee for nearly eight years. I have had correspondence with the Indian authorities in Canada. They have sent me various printed reports and statistics with regard to the administration of Indian affairs in the Dominion. I advocate the adoption of this measure, not believing that it will be a final determination of the question nor that it will set the matter forever at rest, but that it is a step in the right direction, that we are following the path that has been trodden before, and that it offers in the light of the experience of other nations and of other peoples what seems to be the most feasible method of dealing with this great subject to the ultimate advantage both of the Indians and of the whites.

I appeal to the Senator from Alabama and to the Senator from Colorado, who I see has his magazine still loaded with ammunition for the purpose of firing away at this bill, to let us try the experiment. Of course no enactment can be made absolutely perfect. We must do the best we can. We want to go in a certain direction toward solving this problem. Everybody admits that the bill is right so far as it goes. No one has denied that its principal features are meritorious and that its design is just.

Mr. EATON. Will my friend permit me to ask him a question? I have listened with great interest to what he has now been saying, and I beg to ask him if this bill follows at all the direction which has been pursued by the British Government in Canada? Do you not assume at once to make without any previous education these wild men citizens, to give them lands in severalty before you educate them up to the point that Great Britain has educated the Indians in Canada?

Mr. INGALLS. I think not, because the bill contains a provision that to accept its terms the consent of at least two-thirds of the tribe must be obtained. Here is a statute, beneficent in its provisions, changing the whole subject of the relation of the Indian to his tribe and to the Government. The very fact of consent implies the intelligence, and education, and a desire to change his condition to some other different from that which then exists. This, I think, is an answer to the objection suggested by the Senator from Connecticut.

But in this connection I am bound to admit, in view of the criticism by some Senator who has spoken, that I believed when the bill was reported that there was a discretion vested in the President as to the time when this power should be exercised. I see that the language of the bill leaves it doubtful whether the discretion of the President is not to be exercised merely upon the fact whether the character of the land is agricultural or not. I do not think the discretion of the Executive to carry this bill into effect goes far enough. I agree with the Senator who made the suggestion that there should be an Executive discretion reaching far beyond the character of the reservation—a discretion extending to the inquiry whether the Indians possess the requisite capacity, moral character, and intelligence to render it advisable to try an experiment whose consequences might possibly be disastrous and would certainly be irrevocable.

I appeal to the Senate, as this bill has been under such protracted debate, whether it is not advisable, in view of the importance of this question and of other measures now demanding our attention at this late period of the session, that we should have a vote upon this measure to-night, and have done with it. I do not assume that it will settle the Indian question. I have no doubt that those who come after us two hundred and sixty years from now, if there shall be so long an Indian surviving and if this Government shall so long endure, will be discussing just as we are now the Indian problem. I have no idea that the question ever will be settled so long as an Indian exists within the jurisdiction of the Government; but we are tendering, as the organ of the Senate, what seems to us the best that can be done to adjust the immediate difficulties that surround us now. Let us try it. If it fails, we can amend or repeal it. If it fails, we can in the future offer some other measure that perhaps may be more fortunate in securing the approbation of the Senator from Alabama and the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, since I have had the honor to be a member of this body I have listened to a great many speeches evincing a spirit of hostility, a cruel spirit of vengeance, in reference to the Indians, but I have not heard anything so savage, so merciless, and so heartless as that which has emanated from the gentleman who sets himself up as the organ of a committee to whom we have confided the destiny of that unfortunate race of people. If the opinions about the Indians, their history, their present condition, their morals, their instincts, their aptitudes, and their principles as expressed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] are true, then certainly they are the worst people who have ever inhabited any country in the world. But I cannot believe that they could have existed in contact with the civilization of the United States since we have been here, and, as he says, have increased their numbers——

Mr. INGALLS. No, I did not say that.

Mr. MORGAN. Or at least they have maintained their number.

Mr. INGALLS. I said that very nearly they had maintained their number.

Mr. MORGAN. If what the Senator says about them could possibly be true, the people of the United States would necessarily have been compelled to exterminate them, as the Jews exterminated the heathen nations through which they marched after their deliverance from Egyptian bondage, for the mere purpose of removing them as an obstruction to the light of Christianty and civilization.

The Senator, however, in his attempt to berate these people has unconsciously to himself bestowed upon them a great eulogy: that in the midst of the warfare which he says they have waged upon us or that we have waged upon them, and in contact with so many millions of people as we have in this country who are not at all willing to put up with insult or wrong from any set of people, they have been able to maintain themselves in such numbers and amid so many difficulties, so many trials, so many killings, so many warfares, is in my opinion the proudest testimonial that ever was borne to a race in the world. The Senator says in effect (I do not pretend to quote his language) that the Indian is incapable of civilization; and yet right below his own State, in the Indian Territory, there are five tribes who vie with the gentleman in his civilization, whose codes of laws will compare with that of his own State, whose constitution is as good as that of his State, whose institutions are as well applied to Indian civilization as the laws of Kansas are applied to Anglo-Saxon civilization.

Mr. INGALLS. May I interrupt the Senator a moment? I would ask him if he is aware that the condition of what he calls the civilized tribes south of Kansas is largely, if not entirely, due to the infusion of other blood than Indian?

Mr. MORGAN. No, sir——

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Alabama certainly would not claim Boudinot, and Adair, and Pleasants, and Porter, and all that class of intelligent men, to whom I certainly extend the tribute of my sincere admiration, as evidences of Indian civilization?

Mr. MORGAN. Indian civilization among the Seminoles, Creeks, Cherokees, Choctaws, and Chickasaws is as much due to pure Indian blood as it has been to the infusion of white blood. Old Sequoiah, the man who invented the Cherokee alphabet, a work which might have overtaxed even the genius of the Senator from Kansas, was a pure-blooded Indian. They have to-day an alphabet which is the foundation of a written and printed language, which is the equal of the Greek alphabet in its perfectness in expressing every sound and every idea connected with that language. This man, without the instruction of a tutor, fell upon the idea of inventing an alphabet under circumstances like these: he and other young men were speaking together in reference to the power of the white people to convey messages to great distances and have them repeated with perfect accuracy and by reading from a piece of paper what had been recorded there, and they were wondering how such an accomplishment had ever been achieved, when Sequoiah said, "I will write in the Indian language signs and characters so that when they are transferred to a piece of paper and carried a thousand miles an Indian can sit down and read them." Whatever the honorable Senator may be able to boast of our race, certainly there is no man in the United States who has evinced a higher genius than that man did in working out that problem.

But, sir, the Indians have proved themselves to be both brave and magnanimous. I grant you that in times of war they follow savage customs in warfare. Throughout all savage countries and among all savage peoples warfare has been the means of extermination or the infliction of slavery. They have not proved exceptions to their savage associates throughout the world in this particular, and we have well known it when in many instances we have unjustly provoked them to go to war, and because they have used savage methods of warfare we have retaliated upon them, making that the excuse for cruelties which have been enacted and repeated against them by the people of the United States that its history blushes to record.

If this honorable committee has found a true mouth-piece in the Senator from Kansas, then a body of Senators who are the enemies of the Indian race are here legislating for them. I think it will shock the people of the United States to know that a committee animated by such views as the honorable Senator has expressed on this floor to-day has been charged with the sacred duty of their guardianship. Does the bill come from the motives and sentiments which the honorable Senator has uttered here to-day? I never believed it. I thought when the chairman of that committee, whom I prize as a man of excellence and benevolence, and the other gentlemen who compose it, also brought forward a measure for the purpose of benefiting and civilizing the Indians, as it was proposed, they did not inaugurate a measure which might in their hope result in their extermination. But if the measure itself is any explanation of the wishes and purposes of the honorable Senator as expressed here to-day, it is designed to be a measure of extermination. After the picture that the Senator has drawn of the incapacity of the Indian to do anything that is right, or just, or honoroble, is it not a solecism that is absolutely inexplicable that they should commit to the Indian the powers conferred in the ninth section of the bill? I will read it:

That the provisions of this act shall not extend to any tribe of Indians until the consent of two-thirds of the male members twenty-one years of age shall be first had and obtained.

Go to such a band of men as the Senator has described to get their consent to an act of Congress for their government before you receive them! Sir, the absurdity of the statement is so gross that it needs no comment. The principle of the ninth section of the bill is wrong from top to bottom. It is wrong when it comes to be considered with reference to the constitutional powers of the Senate, for there is no principle contained in the ninth section except that the Government of the United States is empowered through its executive department, the Secretary of the Interior or the President as the case may be, to go to the Indians and propose a treaty with them.

I will not stop for the purpose of discussing a matter upon which I once expressed my views in the Senate, but if Senators will consult the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in reference to the treaty-making power of the Government they will see that the bill takes from the Senate its constitutional jurisdiction of making a treaty with the Indians and transfers it to another part of the Government for the purpose of making what is called a contract, or else transfers it to both Houses of Congress. I shall not animadvert upon that feature of it, however, but it is the impossibility of executing it within any reasonable time, within many years to come, of which I complain. It is the fact which I have twice mentioned, and it has not been answered or attempted to be answered, that when the ninth section is enacted into a law it enables one-third of the Indians of any tribe to prevent any individual in the tribe from taking a location in severalty.

After the law has been ratified it then prevents the sale of the lands held in community by the tribe, except by the consent of two-thirds of the Indians. Senators who profess to be willing to give lands to Indians in severalty are here found leaving not to the Indian himself the opportunity to take the land in severalty and to go upon it, but they are giving a minority of one-third of the tribe the power to prevent any member of the tribe from accepting lands in severalty from the hands of the Government of the United States. As the law stands to-day an Indian can go and homestead upon a tract of land, but when this bill is enacted into a law it will prevent any Indian from going upon a location within his reservation and claiming lands in severalty until he can get the consent of two-thirds of his tribe.

It is much easier to criticise me than it is to answer that proposition in this bill. The honorable Senator from Kansas exhibited his discretion and his shrewdness too, when he undertook to comment upon the fact that I had taken the liberty of expressing my opinions upon the floor of the Senate upon the bill rather than upon the propositions which I urged before the Senate, and which, time after time, I have asked some Senator purposing to enact this bill to insert. No gentleman has attempted it; nobody has debated the proposition.

Mr. COKE. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. COKE. The Senator made precisely the same argument in the debate upon the Ute bill, and it was answered repeatedly, and the answer was overwhelmingly sustained by the vote of the Senate, as the debates in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will show.

Mr. MORGAN. It seems to be impossible for my friend from Texas to get the Ute bill out of his head. Because I made an argument upon the Ute bill, exactly in line with the argument that I am now making upon the ninth section of this bill, the Senator takes it upon himself to say that it was answered there and overwhelmingly voted against me. Ah, Mr. President, it was not answered, and although the vote of the Senate was overwhelmingly against the proposition I then advanced, the honorable Senator and the Secretary of the Interior have not got a foot from where they were when the Ute bill was enacted. There it stands, an ineffectual measure, except to get into the pockets of the Indians some seventy thousand dollars, I believe it is, and after they have got the money in their pockets they quietly sit down upon the land, and they do not want to go.

Yes, the celebrated Ute bill, that remarkable abortion, that remarkable failure, which the Secretary of the Interior has been afraid to bring before the Senate of the United States by his report, so that the progress under it might be considered as a test of the probabilities of ever making any progress under a similar provision in this bill, that which has proved an absolute obstruction, that which has engaged the attention of this Government for months trying to persuade a tribe of Indians into it who have not intelligence to understand its principles or propositions at all, is now held up to us as a bar against further argumentation; and yet the Ute bill is as dead to-day as it was before it was enacted. You propose to extend to every Indian tribe in the United States that very measure which has been signalized as a failure in your efforts to give lands to Indians in severalty under its provisions. Do we not know how our agents have been out in Colorado for months and months past holding conventions with the Indians, cozening with them, bribing them with presents of one sort and another; how a salary has been given to Chief Ouray for the purpose of getting his influence in behalf of it; and yet with all the power of the Administration and with all the wisdom of the Ute bill, the Senators who advocated it and the officers and agents of the Government have not been able to make one inch of progress in its execution.

What was answered in reference to the Ute bill is no answer to this bill, which came from the committee in such a degree and shape of perfection that it seems that certain gentlemen of that committee cannot bear for it to be talked about, and cannot bear to enter into any debate in relation to it. It has been amended and amended upon the suggestion of various gentlemen, and to-day, after the amendments, it is in a very much worse shape than it was when it came from the committee.

The honorable Senator from Kansas, near the conclusion of his satire upon the Indians and upon me, referred to the fact that, after all, he himself was not very much in favor of reporting this bill. He must have supposed that there was something in it beneficial to the Indians, otherwise he would not have been favorable to reporting it, according to the principles which he has announced here to-day; but, after all he has discovered, after the lapse of ten days of examination, that there was a very serious imperfection in it, and that, too, early in the bill. He has discovered that the discretion of the President in reference to locating all the Indians on the lands is to be regulated by the character of the soil they live on, and not by the civilization of the Indians, and he has faintly and feebly and apologetically admitted that it would be, perhaps, better that the bill should be amended in that particular. If I have accomplished nothing else in these ten days of discussion, which is attributed almost exclusively to me and the Senator from Colorado, except to persuade the committee to put in that little common-sense view of the question early in the bill, I think I may have done something both for the committee and for the bill. I do not regret the time I have occupied, since, after such a long and laborious exertion, I have compelled the committee to confess that the bill is founded upon a wrong principle in the outset. Time is not thrown away, even when it is bestowed upon honorable Senators who are wiser than Solon was in his palmiest days, if you can add a little bit of information to them or get them to look outside of the boundaries of their own prejudices or their own self-love and take up a proposition that has got a little common sense in it and put it in a bill that we are about to enact.

We have amended the bill again to-day. We have now got the laws of Kansas imposed upon these Indians. I will read you one of those laws. The laws of descent that regulate property in Kansas are, by the amendment accepted by the committee, made applicable to the Indian Territory as far as is practicable. I do not know how far that is; I do not think anybody will ever find out; but let us see how section 2103 of the laws of Kansas which we have enacted to-day will apply to Indians in the Indian Territory:

SEC. 2103. A homestead to the extent of one hundred and sixty acres of farming land, or of one acre within the limits of an incorporated town or city, occupied by the intestate and his family, at the time of his death, as a residence, and continued to be so occupied by his widow and children, after his death, together with all the improvements on the same, shall be wholly exempt from distribution under any of the laws of this State, and from the payment of the debts of the intestate, but shall be the absolute property of the said widow and children.

Which of the widows will this homestead under the laws of Kansas belong to, when an Indian has got five wives and dies leaving them all surviving? Here you have enacted a homestead in favor of the widow, but you have refused upon my repeated solicitation to declare who the widow should be. Are we to have five widows to inherit to the husband this homestead in this way which becomes an absolute right? That is the condition we have got ourselves into in reference to that subject.

I attempted to make some amendment of the bill in reference to the survey of the lands. They have got a bill here which requires that an Indian shall have a pre-emption upon his actual location. What is the location of an Indian upon a tract of land? You go to an Indian village and you find there little tepes strung about at the most convenient places along the side of a water-course, the little tents in which they live. They have been there perhaps for five years or ten years; but no time is prescribed in the bill, except the time when the surveyor appears to lay it off. This bill in its wondrous wisdom, in its awful mechanism, provides that the surveyor shall meander a provisional line between these various tepes, and that after he shall have ascertained what belongs to the tribal claim of each individual, then that it shall be made up to him out of the adjoining land, to be assigned to him in connection with his reservation or his allotment. You might as well send a surveyor into a village of prairie dogs for the purpose of making a survey of their local habitations as to put him among a set of Indians and their tepes to ascertain how much each individual has got a pre-emption upon these lands.

It is not this infirmity only but various others are found in the bill, infirmities which are acknowledged, and which cannot be explained. The wisdom of the committee never has found itself able to come up to a challenge of an explanation, and when objection after objection has been urged against this bill Senators have got behind the defense that gentlemen are somewhat impertinent for venturing to ask that committee a question about the bill. Sir, I am a friend of the measure so far as it relates to the segregation of the Indians in separate allotments of their lands, and placing them in a position where a man can have something that he may call his own; but I want a measure that can be carried into effect. I do not want to put it in the power of the President or of the Secretary of the Interior, at his will and pleasure, to do this, when he can bribe or otherwise cajole a lot of Indians to come and consent to take a share of their property. Let us have a law which is fair. If you will start out by the assertion of the power of Congress to legislate for these people by written laws, and if after having done so make these laws just, wise, and humane, and then if you will fairly execute these laws, you will make an advance in the matter of civilizing Indians; but when you make it a matter of future negotiation and require that two-thirds of the Indian tribe shall assent to the law before it shall have any effect at all, you have done a thing which is bound to be an utter failure.

I should like to call the attention of the honorable committee, if they will not consider it an intrusion upon them, to the fourth section of the bill. I beg pardon, Mr. President, for assuming to ask that committee any explanation or any question whatever about the bill. If I did not feel that it was an imperious duty to do it, I assure you I should not take upon myself the unpleasant duty of making a suggestion to that honorable committee about the bill at all, but there are some things in it which for the sake of their own comfort in after-life, when they come to view deliberately and dispassionately the work of their own hands, I should like to call their attention to, in order to see if they cannot stop now and correct it. Section 4 provides:

That where any Indian not residing upon a reservation, or for whose tribe no reservation has been provided by treaty, act of Congress, or Executive order, shall make settlement upon any surveyed or unsurveyed lands of the United States not otherwise appropriated, he or she shall be entitled, upon application to the local land office for the district in which the lands are located, to have the same allotted to him or her, and to his or her children, in quantities and manner as provided in this act for Indians residing upon reservations, and when such settlement is made upon unsurveyed lands the grant to such Indians shall be adjusted upon the survey of the lands so as to conform thereto, and patents shall be issued to them for such lands in the manner and with the restrictions as hereinafter provided. And the fees to which the officers of such local land office would have been entitled had such lands been entered under the general laws for the disposition of the public lands shall be paid to them from any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, upon a statement of an account in their behalf for such fees by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and a certification of such account to the Secretary of the Treasury by the Secretary of the Interior.

That applies to Indians who do not belong to any organized tribe; it applies in every State and Territory of this Union. How much land do you give in this bill to an Indian in California, in Nebraska, in Kansas, in New York, in North Carolina? You give him as much land as you give to an Indian who belongs to an organized tribe. How much is that? One hundred and sixty acres to the head of a family, eighty acres to each individual person over twenty-one years of age, and forty acres to each person under twenty-one years of age, male or female. What else? Such grazing land, if it is in a grazing country, as may be suitable, under the previous provisions of the act, to which the fifth section applies, as it does to all the rest of the bill. The provision is:

That where the lands on any reservation are mainly valuable for grazing purposes an additional allotment of such grazing lands, in quantities as above provided, shall be made to each individual.

You therefore, under the fourth section of the bill, give to an Indian who does not belong to any tribe the same amount of land which you give to an Indian who belongs to a tribe, and of course your grant is not valuable unless you give him grazing land as well as any other land. Then it amounts to this, that an Indian in the State of Arkansas, if he happens to reside there, or in Alabama—and there are some there now—or in California, or in any other State of the American Union, has a right to have set apart under this bill a quarter-section of land for his family, an eighth of a section for each member of his family over twenty-one years of age, and a sixteenth of a section for each member of his family under twenty-one years of age, and an equal amount of grazing land, provided the country in which the lands are found is suitable for grazing.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Will the Senator from Alabama yield for a motion to adjourn?

Mr. MORGAN. No, I will not. I have been already charged with embarrassing the action of the Senate upon this bill, causing delay; and I am going to vote with the honorable chairman of the committee, if his committee want me to do it, to stay all night if necessary in order to finish the bill.

Mr. BURNSIDE. The chairman of the committee is willing for an adjournment.

Mr. MORGAN. But I am not going to vote to choke down a man who has got something to say, whether foolish or wise, but I would give him an opportunity to express himself in reference to a provision of law as broad, as great, and as comprehensive as this is. That is my attitude upon this subject.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I did not mean to criticise the remarks of the Senator.

Mr. MORGAN. I am not in an attitude of defiance toward the Senator or his committee, but I am in an attitude where I suppose that reason and common sense ought to prevail, and I propose to furnish the modicum I possess, if I possess any at all, in reference to a measure of the importance of that which is under discussion. I hope that the vote will be taken; the yeas and nays have been ordered upon striking out the ninth section. I submit it to the Senate of the United States whether it is going to subordinate itself in such a degree in reference to its legislative power over the Indians as to say that an act of Congress of the importance of this shall not go into effect until two-thirds of the male Indians of each tribe shall assent to the act becoming a law.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I do not propose to unnecessarily detain the Senate; neither do I propose while I am a member of the body to allow the arrogance of any committee or any member of it to deprive me of the right to speak upon a subject as often as the rules of the Senate allow. I think the fairest exemplification of what I said the other day we have had this afternoon. I said that the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs had surrendered their judgment to the Secretary of the Interior. I say here, and it will not be denied by a member of that committee, that this bill came almost exactly as it has come to the Senate from the Secretary of the Interior. When a member of this committee rises in his place and says that he supposed the bill gave the President discretion to put these Indians upon land or not to put them on, and when other members of that committee also say it, I am justified in saying that it did not receive the attention of that committee, I am justified in saying that it is the Secretary of the Interior who comes here to legislate.

Mr. PENDLETON. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. TELLER. I will.

Mr. PENDLETON. I desire to say, Mr. President, that in my opinion the language of the bill extends the discretion of the President of the United States not only as to the character of the land, whether it be suitable for agricultural purposes, but also to the time when the allotment is to be made; and I think the Senator from Kansas who was upon the committee was unguarded in his statement that this discretion of the President was limited only to the character of the land. He is authorized to proceed with the allotment whenever in his discretion the land is of a suitable character, but he is not required to proceed with the allotment whenever in his judgment the land is of that character.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, if I needed any illustration of the statement that I had made that this matter has not been considered, I have got it now. Here is a member of the committee who says he has been a member for eight years, and who assumes, in this discussion, that what is not known by him and the other members of this committee about Indians is not worth knowing. In other words, he arrogates to himself and his committee the sum of all human wisdom on this subject. And yet he rises and says that that discretion is not given to the President, but it is imperative on him. Another distinguished member of the committee rises and says that in that his colleague on the committee was in error. Now, when the committee are divided, when the committee, to whom this matter has been intrusted, and from whom it is said we are to receive all legislation, and to differ with whom is an offense in the Senate, cannot agree, the Senator from Alabama and the Senator from Colorado may, with some propriety, stand up and denounce this bill as not calculated and not intended by the committee to do that which it is professed on this floor it will do.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Now will the Senator from Colorado yield to a motion to adjourn?

Mr. TELLER. No, Mr. President. I do not propose to say very much to-night on this question. I do not care if this Indian question is here for another nine days or nine months. The Indian question is of sufficient importance for the American Senate to be heard on it, and men who have some knowledge of Indian affairs have a right to be heard. I do not know but that the committee have all the knowledge.

The honorable Senator from Kansas says "Why do you not propose something?" Why do we not? Why, Mr. President, under the system of legislation in this body there is a committee of nine men to which every bill of this character goes, and when those nine men sit down in their wisdom, four men besides the Senator from Kansas put a veto upon all kinds of legislation in this body touching that matter and assume for themselves all the virtue and all the intelligence upon the subject. Why, Mr. President, bill after bill has been sent to that committee by members of the Senate embodying their views, and yet they have vetoed them and sat down on them, so to speak, and now they say "Why do you not propose something?" When they propose a bill and any Senator attempts to amend it to make it conform to his ideas, that is an offense; and the Senator from Kansas gets up and reads a lecture to the Senators who have retarded the passage of this bill. Mr. President, I expect to retard it if I can; I expect to vote against it; I hope I may defeat it, but I have very little expectation of that.

The Senator said in substance that the committee in this bill were following the English rule with reference to Canada. I will not say anything about the allusion that he made to my lack of historical knowledge, but the bill has no analogy to any bill that was ever passed by the British Government, and the Senator will not stand here and claim that. That government never attempted to force upon wild Indians land in severalty. The only provision they ever did have in Canada was a provision that these men should be examined, first, as to their qualifications; they should first read and write English and be pronounced sufficiently intelligent to take care of their property, and when they had done that, then, if the proper authorities saw fit, they might give them a grant of land and enfranchise them. There is nothing learned from English history to be applied to this bill. I will not say the honorable Senator is ignorant of Canadian history; I will not say that he intended the Senate should misunderstand what the Canadian history is, but the facts are just as I state.

The bill is pernicious, it is evil, in my judgment, and it ought not to pass, and I should be false to myself if I stood here and allowed it to pass without a vote against it, and I shall never surrender my judgment to the Senator from Kansas, for whom I have a high opinion. I know how well he is versed in Indian affairs, and I shall not surrender my judgment to the committee. He told us that for eight years he had been on this committee. I do not know that he was ever the head of it, but he has been an influential, active member of the committee for eight years having in charge this Indian question so far as the legislation of this body is concerned, being the advisory body in some sense, you may say, of the Secretary of the Interior with reference to legislation of this character. The history of the last eight years is not one that the Committee on Indian Affairs need be proud of; the legislation on this subject is not such that they need come here and boast of it. There are many things on the statutes which will not to-day be approved of. They came here with this bill as crude as it could be, and the chairman of the committee, with all his ability and knowledge, has been actually unable to explain the bill to the Senate and to tell what it meant. The Senator from Alabama is not trifling when he says that he has been unable to draw from this committee any reasonable explanation of the intention and purpose of the bill, save and except when they declare that it is to put a man on a piece of land and give him a patent. The whole theory proceeds simply upon that, and everything else they have no knowledge of whatever.

Now, Mr. President, I propose to offer some more amendments to this bill, and if Senators want to stay here and settle it to-night they can; if they want to adjourn, as far as I am concerned they can adjourn; but no fear of being charged by the committee with obstructing the public service or the public interest will deter me from saying what I see fit to say upon it and offering such amendments as I deem proper. If it ever comes to the time when I am compelled to surrender my convictions to a committee, I will surrender them to a committee that comes to the Senate bearing evidence that they understand the matter and that they have given special attention to it, and I do not believe that this committee have given such attention to it as justifies them in saying that they do understand this question.

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator from Colorado yield to a motion for an executive session?

Mr. TELLER. I want to offer an amendment to the bill to be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed amendment will be received and printed.

Mr. PENDLETON. I ask my colleague to withhold his motion for a moment in order that I may ask the Senate to take up Senate joint resolution No. 142, which is reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds unanimously, and which is intended to carry out a treaty with the Wyandot Indians of 1842 and merely provides that the Secretary of the Interior may have authority to rebuild a mission church and graveyard in the northern part of Ohio which by the treaty were set apart to be preserved in memory of the tribe. The resolution will not take a moment, I think.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio asks unanimous consent to lay aside temporarily the pending order for the purpose of taking up a joint resolution, which will be reported for information.

The Chief Clerk read the joint resolution (S. R. No. 142) relative to the erection of a monument at the Wyandot mission, Upper Sandusky, Ohio.

Mr. MORRILL. The sum named in the original resolution was reduced to $2,000.

The CHIEF CLERK. The committee propose to amend, in line 5, after the word "graveyard," by inserting "at Sandusky, Ohio," and, in line 7, by striking out "$3,000" and inserting "$2,000."

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the original resolution be read. I want to know how it got changed from a monument to a graveyard and church.

The Chief Clerk read the original preamble and joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is unanimous consent given to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Before I consent, I should like to hear the treaty read. I cannot find it.

Mr. PENDLETON. It is the treaty of October 5, 1842.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I cannot find any such treaty in the volume of Indian treaties published in 1846.

Mr. PENDLETON. Page 1020 is the reference I have.

Mr. COKE. I ask that the Senate by unanimous consent agree to take a vote on the pending bill, the Indian severalty bill, on Monday, before adjournment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not agree to that, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made. The proposition cannot be entertained without unanimous consent. Is there objection to unanimous consent to consider the resolution of the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I object because I want to see the treaty; it cannot be found.

Mr. THURMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion being put, there were on a division—ayes 21, noes 16; no quorum voting.

Mr. THURMAN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 30, noes 11; and (at four o'clock and thirty-four minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

Mr. SPEER. I must call for the regular order.

CONTESTED ELECTION—YEATES VS. MARTIN.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called, the House resumes the consideration of the report of the Committee on Elections on the contested-election case of Yeates vs. Martin, from the first congressional district of North Carolina. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. JONES. By reference to the papers in this case, especially the written arguments filed by the parties respectively, and the evidence taken before the committee, it appears that the contestee, Mr. Martin, received a majority of all the votes cast or canvassed by the duly authorized boards of the State of North Carolina. It is also conceded that all of the votes so cast were bona fide and by persons under the laws of North Carolina duly qualified to vote; so that the case presents, in its main and leading issue, the simple proposition whether there shall be a free ballot and a fair count, or whether red-tape and trickery shall predominate and control the elections of the people of the United States. The issue is fairly, clearly, sharply presented by the very issues made by the parties respectively in their briefs before this House. I do not believe that a majority, or even a respectable minority, of either party on this floor would purposely give countenance, encouragement, or sanction either to red-tape or trickery when it in effect stifles or defeats the right of one duly authorized to cast his ballot; and so believing, I am emboldened, notwithstanding the consciousness of the fact that unwilling ears are hard to reach, to address the House on this very important issue.

We all know that after all the opinion of the best of men is controlled more or less by desire. The experience of all teaches that opinion is but a compound of emotion and thought, and that nine times out of ten emotion or desire predominates and determines the conclusion of the mind as to fact and especially as to questions in politics or religion. In making the statement that the issue presented is one clearly and fairly joined of free ballot and fair count on the one side and red-tape and trickery on the other, I mean no reflection whatever on the committee reporting in behalf of the contestant. It is very questionable whether that be the report of the committee or of those who make the report assuming to be the committee.

Now let us turn to the facts in this case. What are they? The sitting member, Mr. Martin, was returned to this House by an official majority of 51 votes. To overcome this majority, and entitle the contestant to the seat now occupied by Mr. Martin, it is insisted that the ballots or the votes cast at three precincts, South Mills, Hamilton, and Vandemere, should be excluded in his interest—these precincts giving Mr. Martin, the sitting member, an aggregate majority of 108 votes—and that to this deduction on the part of the contestant should be added 39 votes improperly rejected by the board of canvassers for that particular county, cast at Providence. Now let us turn to the evidence in reference to it, and see whether these ballots should be rejected. Take, if you please, Hamilton precinct. Should that be rejected? Let us inquire into the grounds upon which the objection is based. We know that gentlemen are very apt to accept as true the report of a majority of a committee and that but few members examined these reports. Here is one precinct, an important precinct, impressing very vitally the result of this election, as to which a majority does not concur, and yet it is to be rejected because the committee has said so.

Now, in reference to Hamilton precinct, it is charged that Mr. Martin, and that is the ground on which the objection to the vote of this precinct is specially based, was present in person manipulating the poll-books. But what does the testimony disclose? It simply discloses that he was there, and the registrar being a democrat and an active, zealous supporter of the contestant, Mr. Yeates, being a little pressed for time, at his instance—that is implied—Mr. Martin simply checked the names on the poll-book when they were called by the registrar. It was done openly; it was done publicly; it was done above-board. Does fraud ever thus appear? How could a man's conduct possibly present higher or more convincing evidence of innocence and artlessness than is here developed in this case?

Am I alone in this opinion? Let us see what the committee itself says in reference to it. How many men on this committee say that this ballot ought to be rejected? Five, all democrats, betraying the force and power of desire on the human mind in coming to any conclusion. How many said this ballot should not be excluded? Seven. Who were they? Five republicans, naturally controlled, as were the five democrats, by desire. But there were two democrats who rose above the influence and impulse of desire, and said this ballot ought not to be excluded. So there are seven to five, and two of the seven coming from the adverse party; thus furnishing a most overwhelming evidence to any impartial mind that this ballot should not be excluded. Let us look at the record by which I am guided in making this statement. Who signed the report? Here are five gentlemen who signed it. I will read the names, in order that the House may be fully in possession of the facts, to the extent of my power to communicate the facts to the House. Those signing the majority report are EMORY SPEER, F. E. BELTZHOOVER, E. C. PHISTER, VAN H. MANNING, WILLIAM SPRINGER—all democrats; while we find the following appended:

> We concur in the result declared in the above report, but do not think that the vote of Hamilton precinct should be excluded.
> W. G. COLERICK.
> SAM'L L. SAWYER.

Here are two men belonging to the opposite political party who, after a thorough examination of the facts, anxious to agree with their friends and political associates, anxious to concur with the majority, could not overcome the overwhelming evidence of the innocence and artlessness of the contestee, or, in other words, could not escape the conclusion that the testimony showed beyond any doubt that his conduct, however improper, had not affected the result of the ballot at that precinct.

Mr. MANNING. If the gentleman will permit me, although I do not like at all to disturb him in his argument——

Mr. JONES. It will not disturb me at all.

Mr. MANNING. It is as to a matter of fact. The gentleman says only five members belonging to the Elections Committee have agreed to reject Hamilton precinct.

Mr. JONES. I said no such thing.

Mr. MANNING. I understood you to say so.

Mr. JONES. They may have done so outside of the record, but they do not do so inside of the record.

Mr. MANNING. If you want the fact I will state it.

Mr. JONES. State it, then.

Mr. MANNING. Governor ARMFIELD, on account of having sprained his ankle several weeks ago, was not able to be in the committee-room at the time the report was adopted, and did not sign that report. But he is in hearty accord with it. And Mr. CLARK, who was not present when the report was adopted, is in accord with the proposition of the report. So there are seven members instead of five who agree to that portion of the report.

Mr. JONES. But by way of offset I will say that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] would have signed the minority report had he been present; making a majority of the committee against that proposition. General WEAVER is present and can speak for himself. Here are, therefore, eight to seven saying that the vote of that precinct ought not to be rejected. Now will this House reject it? That is the question.

It is charged that Mr. Martin acted discreditably. What did he do? He simply checked some names on the poll-book, which any man might have done, which you or I might have done, if we were conscious of no wrong intention. It is only the designing and the artful who are always on the alert and too careful to be caught in any transaction of that sort. All human experience attests that.

Did Mr. Martin design anything wrong? Here was this registrar, a political friend of Mr. Martin's political opponent. Now, if Mr. Martin had declined to act as requested by the registrar it would have looked as if he was a little spiteful toward him because he was supporting the other man. How can he be justly charged with improper conduct when he did only what his political adversary asked? I say that upon the testimony, as well as upon the report, the vote of that precinct should not be rejected.

Here are the names of two democrats of that committee who do not agree to rejecting that vote. You must bear in mind that a majority of the committee are democrats, and thus the contestant has that much advantage to begin with. What lawyer here does not know that it is nine points in the case to have a good jury—a friendly jury.

Now, gentlemen, let us recur to the conclusions reached by the majority again. The report of the majority, as they term it, only seven agreeing to it, elects the contestant by 156 votes. Now, according to the views and opinions of the majority of this democratic committee, you must deduct from that estimate made by these seven members the 64 majority given for Martin at Hamilton precinct. Now, take 64 from 156; 4 from 6 leaves 2, 6 from 15 leaves 9. So you have only 92 majority for the contestant, even according to the showing of this report.

We now will take the laboring oar, and endeavor to overcome the majority reported in behalf of the contestant. You have 92 votes. Can we overcome that number, conceding that the other two precincts were properly excluded, and that the 39 from Providence Township should properly be added? Can we overcome that vote fairly by votes honestly cast? If we can, we need not proceed another step in this inquiry, need we?

We want but 92 votes, and I will show you that there are 108 votes which even this committee, swift though it was to elect the democratic candidate, came to the conclusion reluctantly ought not to be rejected. And I think it was with a great deal of reluctance, and that their consciences must have been terribly exercised when that conclusion was reached.

Where is the vote with which to overcome that 92 majority? Let us turn to Merry Hill precinct and see if we have not 108 votes there which you dare not reject. Now, about those 108 votes at Merry Hill. There is no controversy at all as to the fact; and I need but state the case to win it if you will hear me. What are the facts? The night before the election J. B. Martin, a particular friend of the democratic candidate, earnest and anxious in the service of his friend Yeates, the contestant, procured to be printed a number of tickets headed, "Republican ticket: J. J. Martin for Congress." Those tickets were by him enveloped and addressed through the mail to a prominent republican who usually received and distributed the ballots to his party on such occasions, a colored man, at that place—addressed them to him through the mail so that no suspicion might arise. Those tickets were received and distributed, and so distributed that the voters got hold of them and inconsiderately or inadvertently voted them.

Now, when the poll was over and they came to count the votes, what happened? This very same Martin appeared, as stated in so many words or as inferentially proved, and challenged these very identical votes which he had caused to be voted in this particular form, and he did all that in the interest of the contestant. He appeared and challenged those votes.

Now what was the ground of his challenge? It rested upon a law of the State of North Carolina regulating elections, which forbids any device upon tickets; and these words "republican ticket" printed upon these tickets were challenged as a device.

Now, gentlemen, many of you are lawyers. There are lawyers, or gentlemen so reputed, upon the committee making this report. I ask you in all sincerity if there is an honest lawyer in this House who might not have read the statute of North Carolina and this particular ticket for years and years, and never suspected that the words "republican ticket" constituted a device in the meaning of the law? It is a thing so sharp, a thing so fine, that the idea could never have suggested itself to any one except to a crafty sharper, seeking by any means whatever to overreach and thwart the honest ballots of honest voters. He appeared and challenged these tickets, and strange to say he found a packed board of canvassers ready to hold that those words did constitute a device.

Now, was it a "device," in all candor? Why deceive ourselves? This question is of too much importance to be trifled with thus. Is there a gentleman on this floor who will say that the words "republican ticket" printed on a ballot under such circumstances constitute a "device?" What is the plain meaning of a "device?" How do we all understand it in general or popular acceptation? We take it simply as meaning an emblematic figure; and that is all there is about it. Words do not constitute a "device," in the proper meaning of the term. What was meant by the word "device" as used in the act of the Legislature? It meant simply some emblematic figure—a coon, or a crow, or a chicken, or something of that sort—on the back of the ticket, and not on its face.

I admit that the ticket itself was a "device." The majority of the committee confound one thing with another. The ticket was a "device" contrived by J. B. Martin in the interest of his friend, Mr. Yeates, and was but too successful in securing the rejection of 108 ballots at that precinct. It was a "device;" but the question is, Will this House give sanction to the device and support it?

Mr. SPEER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. SPEER. Does not the gentleman from Texas know that the evidence discloses the fact that the registrar at that election publicly exhibited those tickets and advised the republicans not to vote them before any of them were voted?

Mr. JONES. Yes; the testimony did disclose the fact that partial notice was given; but the testimony wholly fails to show that any one of the men who voted those 108 tickets ever received such information at all. That announcement made by the registrar was a part of the trick; do you not see? It only shows how studied the thing was.

I wish to call attention briefly to the law in reference to this question, although the time allotted to me will not permit me to discuss the great questions involved. The majority of the committee say that they came with great reluctance to the conclusion that these 108 votes ought not to be counted. If you do count them the sitting member is elected by 12 majority; and you cannot help it to save your lives. Now, will you reject those votes, and thus reward with success what you know to be a trick and a fraud?

Let us see what the laws of North Carolina are on this subject. If gentlemen of the majority of the committee had studied the laws of North Carolina a little better they would not have fallen into so great errors as appear in their report, which I will expose by and by. What does the constitution of North Carolina provide on this subject? It says:

> Every male person born in the United States, and every male person who has been naturalized, twenty-one years old or upward, who shall have resided in the State twelve months next preceding the election, and ninety days in the county in which he offers to vote, shall be deemed an elector. But no person who, upon conviction or confession in open court, shall be adjudged guilty of felony or of any other crime infamous by the laws of this State, and hereafter committed, shall be deemed an elector unless such person shall be restored to the rights of citizenship in a manner prescribed by law.

Thus it will be seen who are declared by the laws of North Carolina to be voters. Does the constitution prescribe any action of the Legislature in order to entitle a suffragan or voter to the exercise of the privilege thus secured to him by organic law? There is one such provision; and I will read it:

> SEC. 2. It shall be the duty of the General Assembly to provide from time to time for the registration of all electors; and no person shall be allowed to vote without registration, or to register without first taking an oath or affirmation to support and maintain the Constitution and laws of the United States and the constitution and laws of North Carolina not inconsistent therewith.
> SEC. 3. All elections by the people shall be by ballot; and all elections by the General Assembly shall be viva voce.

All that is required of the voter is to register. How is he to vote? How is he to exercise the privilege conferred upon him by the constitution of the State? Is he to vote viva voce? No. How? By ballot. Now, can the Legislature interpose and say what kind of a ballot he shall cast? Is not the constitutional privilege of voting by ballot conferred upon the voter by the paramount law of the State? What authority has the Legislature to interpose and say that the voter shall not put this or that upon his ballot? If he offers to vote, and presents a ballot, he has complied fully with the requirements of law, provided he be a registered voter. There is an end of the whole question. If the Legislature can interpose and say that he shall vote a ballot of this or that particular shape or that he shall put this or that particular word upon it, how easily may the Legislature, as it has attempted to do, deprive legal voters of the right to vote altogether? Grant such an authority on the part of the Legislature and you throw open a door which invites chicanery, fraud, and trickery in all your elections. The result inevitably is to place elections solely in the power of political engineering tricksters. Surely tickets cannot be thrown out on this or that little pretense. What does the voter naturally do when seeking to ascertain his rights? He takes up the constitution of the State and says, "Here is all I am required to do; I cannot vote viva voce, because my vote would not be in accordance with the constitution of the State, but I can offer my ballot and no tribunal of North Carolina can reject it without violating the constitution of the State."

Do you know how this act in regard to a "device" upon tickets originated in the State of North Carolina? I was amazed when I heard this question sprung here in the House; and I sought an explanation. I knew there must be some explanation, because a thing of this kind could never have happened unless there had been some exigency suggesting it. Prior to the passage of that act there was an election contest in that State when some issue was made involving homesteads, &c. The republican party put upon the outside of their tickets a figure representing a house or homestead; and they carried the election by 10,000 majority. This suggested to the democratic party the necessity of passing some law condemning the placing of such "devices" upon ballots. That picture of a house was a "device;" and it was at such things the law was aimed. The democratic party had been beaten by tickets having a figure upon them; and they sought to change the law and prevent such a thing happening again. There is the history of the whole thing. As stated by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. RUSSELL] the other day, the democratic party time and again since the enactment of this identical statute have voted ballots having upon them the words "democratic ticket," and nobody thought of challenging them. It was left to J. B. Martin to discover that such words constitute a "device," and to the election board of that particular precinct to sustain that pretense.

Now, then, gentlemen, such being the facts, I ask you in all candor if you had lived in North Carolina and read the constitution and this ballot was offered to you, would not you have naturally voted it without supposing you were in any way violating the laws of your country? Has it not the form of ballot to which they were always accustomed? Do you mean to change the laws from day to day only to entrap and trick the unwary and unsuspecting? Do you mean to hang laws so high nobody can read them until he shall have incurred the penalty and forfeited his life, politically speaking?

I say to you now, as honest men, I say to you as men whom I believe to be incapable of perpetrating an outrage upon the elective franchise of the American people, you cannot give sanction to any such trickery as this.

I do not mean to reflect on this committee; but, gentlemen, if I had the time I could delineate this whole thing, and I would show you the paternity of the committee's report. It comes from the author of this very trick, J. B. Martin. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPEER rose.

Mr. JONES. Let us look at it, let us see. The gentleman from Georgia, if he wrote it, simply copied the ideas of J. B. Martin. My judgment is, it happened about in this way. Have I not the right to conjecture without offending anybody? Democrats as well as republicans are very confiding. One man was selected to prepare the report; he was in a hurry, and had to attend a party, and he employed a clerk, and J. B. Martin, true to the instinct of his craft, got with the clerk and prepared the report. That is my judgment about it. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPEER. I desire to say to the gentleman from Texas his statements are entirely unwarranted by the fact. As a member of that sub-committee to which this matter was committed, I prepared that report myself, and dictated every word of it to the second assistant clerk of the Committee on Elections, and am responsible for every word of it. The gentleman's statement, therefore, is untrue and his conclusion unwarranted.

Mr. KEIFER. Will the gentleman from Texas let me interrupt him?

Mr. JONES. Well.

Mr. KEIFER. I wish to know from the gentleman from Georgia whether he made the statement that he wrote all of that report?

Mr. SPEER. All of that report except that part which was written by Mr. FIELD, of Massachusetts, where he admits that these very ballots were illegal.

Mr. KEIFER. That is all.

Mr. SPEER. Yes; that is all. You asked me the question and I have answered it.

Mr. MANNING. And now the gentleman from Ohio does not want the answer.

Mr. JONES. I wish to call the attention of gentlemen to some points in reference to the argument; I have it here. I do not speak unadvisedly; I do not take positions without counting the responsibilities they imply. I know exactly what I am talking about. I want to call your attention to some grave errors into which they have fallen.

I do not believe there is a single gentleman who signed that report who would misstate a fact or misrepresent the laws of North Carolina to this House. Now, have they done it? That is the question. If they have done it, and if the gentleman from Georgia wrote that report, let him take the responsibility before the country. I wish to call his attention to some singular contradictions, and then we will understand this case a little better. He says——

Mr. WILSON. What page?

Mr. JONES. Report, second page. In speaking of the vote of Salem, the committee state—I mean the report states this:

The evidence of the contestee discloses that the polls were not opened until twelve o'clock, when the law is mandatory that they should be opened at seven; that before they were opened, a large number of the voters of the precinct had left; that not more than half of the vote of the precinct was polled; that there was no registrar appointed, and that officers who held the election were not sworn.

Mark, this is the language of the report of this committee, that the officers who held the election at Salem precinct were not sworn. They state that the evidence of the contestee discloses that fact.

We will now see what it discloses and to what extent these gentlemen are complaining of a little criticism. We turn to Salem precinct here, and what do we see? What is it? They state there was no registrar there—do you not remember? They state the officers who held the election were not sworn—do they not? I will show you the contrary from the depositions of Wilcox. He swears he was the registrar. We get down here especially to his testimony. Let us see what he says in reference to it. He swears that he was registrar of the election at Salem precinct. He states:

Q. Were the judges or inspectors of the election at Salem precinct for said election on said day of the election sworn, and if so, by whom?
A. They were, by me.

A flat contradiction! And still gentlemen say that I do them injustice when I say they did not make this report. Why, sir, it is a matter of kindness on my part to them, a great stretch of charity to come to the conclusion they did not write it. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPEER. Will not the gentleman admit that the person who swears he swore them was the sheriff of the county, who had no authority under the law to administer the oath?

Mr. JONES. That is what I stated; but does it follow they were not sworn? [Laughter on the democratic side.] It is facts we want.

Mr. MANNING. Now it requires charity to be exercised toward the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. JONES. Why do you not state to this House the facts and the circumstances in reference to it?

They were sworn in good faith, and so believing they acted in good faith. They were sworn by a de facto officer, recognized as such, and they were in conscience bound by the solemnity and force of that obligation. You cannot make anything else of it.

But gentlemen are a little tender about that. I stated that I suspected that Martin had written that report, and the gentleman seems to be peculiarly tender on that point. But what is there in the nature of this case to suggest this conclusion? Let me see. I will return to the precinct business; I do not want to be diverted from that. I want to show this precinct matter in this connection, to show it clearly, in order that I may trace what they say in reference to Goose Nest precinct. Now, what do they say? There is an important question involved in this case. What, then, do these gentlemen say in reference to Goose Nest precinct?

The committee cannot sustain the claim that is made by the contestee, that 164 votes should be counted for him at the Goose Nest precinct, which were rejected by the managers of the election there.

Why?

It is not denied by the contestee that all who were denied the right of voting at this precinct were registered in Hamilton precinct, which was another precinct in the same county. The law of North Carolina requires that a voter who is registered in one precinct cannot vote in another, without producing a certificate of the erasure of his name from the registration list of the precinct where he is registered. The reason for this rule is obvious. If voters are registered in two or more precincts in the same county, the entire object of the registration law is avoided, for they might vote in every precinct where they are registered.

Now, gentlemen, I want your attention to an allegation here clearly, unequivocally made that the laws of North Carolina require a voter who had been previously registered in another precinct to present a certificate of erasure before he could be allowed to vote elsewhere. That is the statement here plainly and emphatically made in this report.

I tell you emphatically that there is no such law on the statute-books of North Carolina. There is a law which requires that where a voter registered in one precinct removes to another, before he shall be permitted to register in the precinct to which he has removed he shall be required to present a certificate of erasure from the poll-books or registration books of the antecedent precinct. But there is no law requiring or even permitting a certificate to be given in any other case. The certificate contemplated by the statute is one making a condition-precedent to registration in a new precinct, and not a permission or privilege to vote at all. The North Carolina law in reference to that, according to the constitution as well as to the law of the State, can require of the voter only residence proper within the precinct, county, or State, and that he be registered under the laws of the State, and cannot go a step beyond that.

That is the law. Now, I ask the gentlemen who drew this report to show the law that requires what is alleged here. I say the law requires no such thing.

Now, it is apparent that the gentleman representing the other side [Mr. Martin] also makes the same statement, falling into precisely the same error, or perhaps purposely attempting to perpetrate it. I will refer you in this connection to the twelfth section of the act of the Legislature of North Carolina, which relates to this question. What does that provide? It provides no such thing as is contemplated by this report. Why did not gentlemen state the facts in this connection? The law was before them. They had access to the statute. Now, what are the facts in reference to the case? They are, first, that the Goose Nest precinct and Hamilton precinct constituted originally a single precinct. In the August election prior to or preceding this November election, or rather last preceding it, these two precincts voted together as one precinct. Subsequently by the act of the county court the one precinct was divided and two were erected out of it. In other words, Goose Nest precinct, which had formerly existed, was re-established by the act of the county court. What did the county court do? Just precisely what it should have done, and what it ought to have done, and what it did. It directed the transfer of the names of all the registered voters who resided in Goose Nest precinct as fixed territorially by the act of the county court to a registration book for that precinct. The registrar was appointed and the transfer was made, and no condition whatever was imposed upon the voters at all. Section 12 of the laws of North Carolina contemplated nothing different from what they did, and I will call your attention to that section in a few moments, for I will read it.

I again say I do not mean any disrespect whatever to the gentlemen making this report. But somehow they have fallen into a gross error in regard to it. I say again, what are the facts in reference to these precincts? The books were prepared, the registrar was appointed for the new precinct, the names were transferred, not transcribed, remember, but transferred.

Now, what is the effect of transferring one's name from one list to another? I ask any gentleman upon this floor if the transfer of the name from one list to another does not carry with it the erasure of the name from the former list? I ask any lawyer, if your name be upon one list and transferred to another, if the fact of that transfer does not wipe out the name from the prior list, and if the very fact that a transfer is made does not accomplish this; and also if this does not follow as a necessary consequence of the transfer? Now, to say that the name of the voter is upon the registration books of Goose Nest precinct and is yet upon the registration book of Hamilton precinct is to assert that the name has not been transferred and that it is upon both lists.

What is the meaning ordinarily of the word "transferred?" Go to your Departments, take the different classes of clerks, and when a clerk is transferred from one list to the other, I ask, gentlemen, is not his name dropped from the list from which it was transferred? And as here employed, can it mean anything else? So that when the voter appeared at Goose Nest precinct asking to vote there was the registrar armed with the registration book, and it was ascertained whether the party was duly registered, and when that was ascertained he was entitled to vote; and nothing but a tribunal inferior in its character to an Arkansas justice of the peace could have held otherwise. [Laughter.]

Now I want to call your attention to this law. Some friend has turned it up and placed it before me just now. I want to read that twelfth section and ask any man if there ever was a lawyer in the United States that would have applied this law to this particular case? I challenge the attention of lawyers; and I want to say to you, gentlemen, you are voting here to-day for yourselves and for the honor and dignity of the position that you occupy. If seats are to be won and held in this House by trickery and fraud, a gentleman would scorn the place. And I again say, lest gentlemen get tender, that I mean no offense; but when one puts himself in court we have the right to criticise him. When a gentleman comes here and throws down the gauntlet and invites criticism, ought he to complain when he himself is criticised? When the gentleman from Georgia in the conclusion of his speech the other day took occasion to tell the House how impartially and magnanimously he had dealt with the republicans, I heard rather a rude figure made use of touching that gentleman's conduct, I shall not say by whom. It was said: "Oh yes, he is very fair; he is like the little boy who made the apple trade in the back woods; he traded off a dozen rotten apples to get one sound one." Here were a lot of rotten cases with no soundness in them, and he swapped them all for Yeates, of North Carolina.

Now, here is the twelfth section of the North Carolina election laws. The attorneys for the contestant refer to that twelfth section as the law governing this case. So also does this committee adopt the idea and nearly the very same language. I will read it to you, and I ask you as lawyers, and some of you are, if there is a legal mind—although some men do go crazy—that could have applied this law to the case I have just stated. Let us see; and suppose it does apply, what would be the consequences following? Here is the twelfth section:

Every person who shall present himself for registration shall state, under oath, how long he has continuously resided in this State, and in the county in which he offers to vote, whether he is an alien or native born, &c.

I will not read it all. It would detain me too long, and every gentleman can read it who wishes. I will read what relates to a case of removal:

And if an elector has previously been admitted to registration in any ward, township, or precinct in the county in which he resides, he shall not be allowed to register again—

He has got to re-register, but he shall not be allowed to re-register—in another ward, precinct, or township in the same county, until he produces a certificate of the registrar of the former township, ward, or precinct that said elector has removed from said township, ward, or precinct, and that his name has been erased from the registration books of the ward, township, or precinct from which he has removed, &c.

Now, here are two different cases altogether. They are different in their reason, and the one bears not the slightest analogy on earth to the other; not in the remotest degree. Here is a case where A, residing in Hamilton precinct, removes to another precinct. Before he can vote in that precinct he has to re-register, or register de novo. In order to do this he has to produce a certificate from the registrar from the district from which he removes that he has so removed, and, in addition, that his name has been dropped or erased from the registration books of that precinct. Here is a case which contemplates forfeiture, loss of registration in one precinct by the act of the voter; but here it was not done by the act of the voter. He was in his own original precinct. He had not removed at all. It was the same precinct, only it was created a new precinct. There was not, therefore, devolved upon him the duty of re-registering at all. He was a qualified voter duly registered in that precinct. The law which made the change undertook, and very properly undertook, to do and perform everything necessary to secure to him the benefits of his original registration. How was that done? By directing and providing for the transferring of his name to a new set of registration books corresponding to the new precinct into which he was thus by the act of the law itself transferred.

I say, then, when this committee comes in here and asks us to accept as true and swear by their report, after these gross and palpable inconsistencies thus exposed, they ought certainly to indulge some little charity toward wayward human intellect that ventures to inquire a little into the matter and really distrusts a little their proceedings.

Now let the gentleman occupy the time in explaining that. Do you propose to palm off on this House a proposition that the twelfth section of the North Carolina statutes applies to this case? Let gentlemen state the facts, and let us act understandingly.

I will now recur to the Merry Hill precinct. And I ask these gentlemen not to get offended. I want them to meet the case right here. Now, did not J. B. Martin practice a fraud on the 108 men who cast the ballots to which I have referred? Yes, nobody controverts that; he admits it himself. Now, tell me, if you please, the difference between the man who perpetrates a wrong thing and the man who takes and appropriates the benefit resulting from that wrong? Tell me the difference, if you please, between the man who steals my goods and the man who, knowing them to be stolen, appropriates them to his own use and benefit? As lawyers you know that the accessory would be sent to the penitentiary, if the principal was guilty of a crime incurring that penalty. Yet gentlemen say here on both sides that this case is entirely free from fraud. I know it is in latter-day politics, because fraud has lost its original signification. Nowadays smartness in politics is something all right. Act as you please, do anything, so that you do it legally, technically, and you are a smart fellow. Why, sir, we are renewing in some form the old Spartan law that would not punish a boy for stealing if he was smart enough to hide it. It was to stimulate their courage, it was said; and I suppose this House is asked to reject these 108 votes just to stimulate the courage and cunning of these poll-sharps.

And I do not mean any personal offense; I could not do that. I am speaking of the matter in an official point of view. Here is a man who stole the goods, and here is the man who used them. Both are guilty, are they not? And now I want to know what is to become of the men or the tribunal that gives comfort and assistance in the escape of the man who uses the stolen goods? That is this committee, don't you see? I am alluding to them. [Laughter.]

Now, I ask this committee right here, I ask them solemnly as the Representative of an independent constituency, I challenge them upon their oaths to say in the presence of God and man if they are not just as guilty as J. B. Martin in sanctioning the fraud he committed? I do not say it, but I challenge them to say if it be not so?

Mr. FINLEY. Does the gentleman apply the principles he now urges to the Louisiana electoral count?

Mr. JONES. That gentleman is perfectly insane upon everything touching Louisiana. [Laughter.] Now, to come back to the point. I do not wish to be, I do not mean to be, offensive. It is a painful duty to perform. I know there are good men not only upon that side of the House but upon this side. My experience is that in personnel there is no difference between them at all. But what does this thing evidence? It evidences the power that clannishness now possesses and wields in elections.

Mr. SPEER. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. JONES. I do not wish to lose any of my time. The gentleman has had nearly two years in this case, and now he wants some of my little time.

Shall I say another word in reference to this matter? I will tell you what the country will say. It will say that you are balancing up and making things even. You have turned out Hull and put in Bisbee, and away goes $10,000 from Uncle Sam's Treasury. And now you propose to turn out Martin and put in Yeates, and $10,000 more goes in the same direction. Now if you merely wanted to swap horses and leave things square, why did you not retain Hull and Martin both, and at the same time retain $20,000 in the common Treasury?

Here is an important point I have made in this case, and I challenge you, not defiantly, for I cannot do any such thing, but I ask you as honest men to say if you will not count the 108 votes which Martin got the voters to poll in that precinct? I ask you to say if they were not legally polled? And if not legally polled, because of trick or fraud through the machinations of the opposing party, and it is sought to deprive the sitting member of them, will you give the contestant the benefit of that fraud? Shall Mr. Yeates come here and ask you to purge polls in other cases because of fraud, and yet will you refuse to do justice that he may have the benefit of that refusal? Have you forgotten the old maxim? He that seeks equity, let him do equity; let him come into court with clean hands before he invokes justice or equity.

Mr. SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. STEVENSON.) The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] has expired.

Mr. WEAVER. I ask that the time of the gentleman be extended.

Mr. SPRINGER. There is another hour for debate on that side.

Mr. SPEER. And that hour is under the control of the gentleman in charge of the case over there.

Mr. JONES. I want only fifteen minutes.

Mr. HUMPHREY. As the gentleman asks for only fifteen minutes, I ask unanimous consent that he have it.

Mr. SPEER. We cannot consent to that; two hours for debate were allowed to the other side to-day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Florida [Mr. BISBEE] as now entitled to the floor.

Mr. BISBEE. I would cheerfully yield a part of my time to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] if I had not agreed to yield it to another gentleman.

Mr. PAGE. I hope there will be no objection to giving the gentleman from Texas fifteen minutes more time.

Mr. SPEER. We cannot consent to that.

Mr. HUMPHREY. If that is not allowed we will lose at least fifteen minutes time in discussing about it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the Chair understand that the gentleman from Florida [Mr. BISBEE] yields a portion of his time to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. BISBEE. I have not agreed to do that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Then the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Florida [Mr. BISBEE] as entitled to the floor.

Mr. VALENTINE. The gentleman from Florida had agreed to yield a portion of his time to me; but if it is understood by the House that there is but one hour left for debate on this side, and if the gentleman from Florida desires to address the House for at least one-half of that time, I do not desire to speak on this question, because I do not feel that I could do it justice in thirty minutes. Therefore, so far as I am concerned, the gentleman may, if he chooses, yield the time desired. I will, however, ask unanimous consent that I may print some remarks on this subject.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska, [Mr. VALENTINE?] The Chair hears none, and leave is granted. [See Appendix.] The Chair now desires to know whether the gentleman from Florida yields a portion of his time, and if so, what portion, to the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. JONES.]

Mr. BISBEE. I thought the House would give the gentleman from Texas unanimous consent to proceed. [Cries of "No!" "No!"] Then I yield the gentleman fifteen minutes.

Mr. JONES. Now, there is one other point that I want to make. By the report of the majority of the committee Hamilton precinct is allowed, which reduces the majority of the contestant to 96 votes, even if his majority without this precinct be conceded, according to the claim of the contestant himself, to be 156. Now, Vandemere precinct, excluded by the majority of the committee, gave the contestee 40 majority, and South Mills precinct, excluded by the majority of the committee, gave the contestee 64 majority, making 104 majority; so that if these two precincts are erroneously excluded the majority of the contestant is overcome. Now, I make the point that the two precincts, Vandemere and South Mills, were excluded solely upon the ground that the polls were not opened at 7 o'clock a. m. on the day of the election. I have not time to read the report, but that is the ground given by the majority of the committee for rejecting these two precincts. There is no evidence establishing fraud at those precincts; there is no evidence showing that anybody who remained and endeavored to vote was prevented from voting; but the majority of the committee assume that the law in regard to the opening the polls at seven o'clock is mandatory.

Now, gentlemen, tell this House what you mean by "mandatory." Do you mean that at every election the law must be conformed to in every particular, or else the entire election is an absolute nullity? Do you mean to hold that the provision of the law requiring the polls to be opened at seven o'clock is not, as the lawyers say, merely directory, but is mandatory in such a sense that not being complied with the election is an absolute nullity?

If you take that ground I hold you to your own authority as quoted by yourselves. What is the decision of the courts in reference to this very question? The decision of the courts, as quoted in the majority report, is that if the polls be closed before the time prescribed by law, or opened after the time prescribed, and in consequence a sufficient number of voters to change the result are prevented from voting, the result is—what? That the entire election is rendered absolutely null for the good reason that you cannot tell who would have received those votes, and therefore cannot tell who was elected. Now, if the vote of those precincts is decisive, and if those precincts are to be excluded on the ground given, then as a matter of course, instead of Mr. Yeates being elected as you contend, I say that according to the very authority you cite, there is no election at all; the election must be remanded to the people.

If you will get your almanacs and examine them, you will find that the sun did not rise until half-past six o'clock on the second Tuesday of November, 1878, and I will undertake to say that there was not a solitary poll in that congressional district, or any other in that State, that was opened at seven o'clock on that day; so that if the position of the majority of the committee be correct, there is not a solitary member now sitting here properly as a Representative from that State.

Do you insist upon that doctrine as law? If you do, I ask you as lawyers to tell me where you learned such law. Did you learn it from that man J. B. Martin? It is the doctrine propounded in his brief. You certainly found it in no law book in the United States. For years and years we have been holding proper elections; and there is not a single instance where an election was declared absolutely null and void because the polls were not opened at the particular time prescribed by law. We have been holding elections for one hundred years; and if we are now so strained in this case that we must needs make a precedent contradicting and overthrowing the practice and experience of one hundred years in order to seat this contestant, do not those who do this subject themselves at least to criticism whether they deserve it or not? That is for them to determine. I do not speak here in any spiteful spirit; I certainly would not willfully wound any man's feelings; but in discussing these questions we must necessarily be somewhat angular at times as well as incisive; the case demands it.

Now, the proof shows that at South Mills the polls were opened at half past nine, or perhaps fifteen minutes after. The proof shows that every legal voter who remained and sought to vote was allowed to vote. Now, if you exclude these precincts on such a ground, you may be honest in doing so, but I ask whether an honest, unsophisticated mind would not suspect that you did so because you wanted to elect one man and defeat another? I do not put the question myself, but does it not thrust itself into this case? That is a point which is itself decisive and conclusive in this case, and I ask gentlemen on the other side to pause before they follow party blindly in sustaining such a position.

Let me come back to the point. I ask you whether I did not state the question fairly? If the votes were honestly cast, and there is no suspicion placed on them, if they were all honest ballots, if they were all fair ballots, if no one was prevented from voting, if they be cast out and the man who received the majority be unseated and ousted and another take his place, will it not be the triumph of red tape and trickery over a free election and fair count? That is the position we occupy. I do not speak especially for anybody on this floor but myself, but as "greenbackers," weak in number, we must needs rely on the right. We have no other course. We can turn neither to the right hand nor to the left, unless our cause be backed and supported by the right. When we have that, we can challenge the worst, even fate itself.

We, the greenback party, want to be right. Gentlemen come up here and disclaim interest, partiality, bias, and all that. In behalf of my party, I say this, if we vote with the republicans on this or any other occasion, it is because we do not permit them or anybody else to outstrip us in devotion or support of a free ballot and a fair count. It is the cardinal principle of the greenback party. Without it we can never hope to win. The very same elements of place and power which now manipulate the two old parties will control forever if the greenback party cannot get a free ballot and a fair count. It is, then, in the interest of that party, it is in the interest of this idea, we are fighting for a free ballot and a fair count.

What is to be gained, I ask, by unseating one man and seating another? The object of election laws, and indeed of all laws, is—to do what? It is to ascertain the sentiment, the will, the wish of the honest voter, and when it is ascertained, the end of the law having thus been accomplished, it should have force and effect in our republican Government. It is the only object of it. Shall I tell lawyers on that side of the House who have read law and learned it, that when the reason of the law ceases the law itself ceases? Why these technicalities, these ceremonies, these rubrics surrounding our polls, except to prevent them against fraud and intrigue and trickery?

If the ballot be shown to have been fairly and honestly given, it matters not whether it came in the back door or the front door. It is a matter of no concern whether red-tape was properly tied here or crumpled a little there. If it be an honest vote by a man under the law entitled to give it, the end of the law is accomplished, and it devolves upon this House, possessing both legal and equity jurisdiction, as I contend, to say whether the ballot shall be counted or not.

Mr. BISBEE. Mr. Speaker, during the short time I have been in possession of my complete rights on the floor of this House it has been intimated to me, if not openly suggested in public debate on the floor of the House, that gratitude should keep me silent in this case. I hope, sir, that I shall never be so wanting in the nobler impulses of the human heart as ever to be ungrateful for any favor conferred, especially by the other side of this House. But I know of no definition of gratitude that requires its expression for the conferring of a right long, too long, withheld from me and my constituents.

And I am not precisely a volunteer in this case. The sitting member knew that for a decade and a half and over I had lived in and breathed the same political atmosphere he has, and possibly thought I may have a keener insight and a keener appreciation of democratic methods in the South than gentlemen who live in other and, in this respect, more favored portions of our common country.

Now, if I make a summary statement of this case it will be correct to say that the majority of the committee propose to reject all the votes of four polls at each of which the sitting member had a majority and at all of which he had a majority of 303. They also propose to reject the 108 ballots headed "republican ticket," and the 120 at Goose Nest they refuse to count.

I shall confine my remarks to three precincts, Hamilton, Merry Hill, and Goose Nest, because under the decision of the majority of the committee if at any two of these polls the votes in question be counted the sitting member has a majority. But this is not all. In order to seat the contestant, if my calculation is accurate, we have to disfranchise 1,313 of the duly qualified electors of the State of North Carolina. That is the whole proposition with which we are confronted. It has been stated, and I repeat it, we are asked to count out the sitting member. Now I may be naturally rather sensitive on that subject and interpose objections. The pleasure afforded to him who is counted in is not entirely unmixed with pain, while to the counted out it is an unending source of unmitigated torment.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. SPEER] says that one precinct takes pride in the euphonious name of Goose Nest. We have all heard of a mare's nest, but the gentleman from Georgia can take to himself the proud distinction of having found a very large mare's egg in a very small goose nest. [Laughter.]

Now, as to the facts of this precinct. The gentleman in his report (he admits it is his report) says:

> Before, however, the committee can set aside the action of the authorities of the State of North Carolina they must have submitted to them better evidence than that which the contestee has offered, that 154 votes were registered.

In another place he says:

> Not one of these 154 voters was called, although they were all residents of that precinct. The witness W. A. Johnson tells a very incredible story, and it is but reasonable that had 154 voters been refused the right of voting at that precinct, the contestee would have offered evidence sufficient to satisfy the committee of the fact. * * * None of these voters are identified by evidence sufficient.

Now, I propose, Mr. Speaker, to show that the contestant himself has admitted over his own signature that these voters whose votes are in question were present and tendered their votes. I send to the Clerk's desk, and ask him to read on this subject that portion of the brief of the contestant in reference to Goose Nest precinct, which covers this point, premising that it is signed "Jesse J. Yeates, contestant."

The Clerk read as follows:

> The contestee has filed a list of names of 160 persons who he says desired to vote for him but were refused and not allowed to do so.
> The evidence printed by the contestee, pages 64 and 73, inclusive, printed record, shows very conclusively that they had no right to vote. Goose Nest precinct had been abolished in 1876, after which the voters of said precinct registered and voted at Hamilton precinct, the same township. In August, 1878, Goose Nest precinct was re-established, and the statute of North Carolina, acts of 1876 and 1877, chapter 275, sections 11 and 12, require the voters at Goose Nest precinct to obtain a certificate from the registrar of Hamilton precinct, certifying that they had been registered on the registration books at Hamilton precinct, and their names had been erased, in order to allow them to vote at Goose Nest precinct anterior to the day of the election. This these men had refused or declined to do, but simply came forward, without complying with the law, and offered to vote at Goose Nest precinct, while they were registered at Hamilton precinct on the books. They were properly refused, as the law was ample to prevent men voting at two precincts.

Mr. BISBEE. Now, the point I make is this: that the report says, and it is a very important branch of this case, that the evidence is not sufficient to satisfy the committee that these men came forward and tendered their votes. One witness, Mr Johnson, testifies that when he found the votes of these men were being refused he took upon himself the task to make a complete list of them, and he wrote out the names and looked at the ballot of each voter as he came up to vote and was refused. The gentleman upon the other side, from Georgia, has criticised very severely the testimony of Mr. Johnson. He thinks it very remarkable that he should have written down the names of those rejected voters and that he should have looked at the ballots which they offered to vote. Why, it is the very thing that would be done everywhere under similar circumstances. Nothing is more natural than where in a case of this kind he found that his candidate was losing votes by the erroneous ruling of the election officers that he should take their names and look at the ballot with a view of proving that fact thereafter, in case of a contest. It is set forth in the report that Mr. Martin should have called the voters individually to testify.

That would have been no better evidence than we have here. The witness Johnson testifies to what he saw. Now, the testimony of A to an act performed by B is just as high testimony as the testimony of B himself would be to the same act. It is not secondary evidence. It is primary evidence; and if he had called each individual voter in this case he would have had but one oath of each voter to the fact that he tendered his vote and was refused; and that we have here now. The testimony of the witness, Mr. Johnson, unimpeached, no effort made to impeach it in any manner whatever, is that each of 120 of these voters actually tendered their votes and were refused.

Mr. SPEER. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. BISBEE. With pleasure.

Mr. SPEER. Will he not concede that one method of impeaching a witness is to disprove the fact testified to by him?

Mr. BISBEE. I will come to that presently.

Mr. SPEER. Mr. Lamb, the registrar, testifies that the registration list from which Mr. Johnson says these names were called did not contain the names of all the men he claimed were on the list that he made.

Mr. BISBEE. I will come to that and answer it in a moment.

I repeat, the contestant has admitted the fact that they were there in person and tendered their votes, and the only question here for us to decide is whether or not they were lawful voters. Again, the gentleman from Georgia knows, every lawyer knows that when a fact is assumed in the progress of a trial of a case and after the testimony is adduced, if in the argument before the court or the jury counsel should undertake to deny that a fact so assumed to exist had not been and ought to have been proven, he would be stopped in his argument. Any member of the bar that should attempt that would be rebuked by any upright judge.

But here not only is this fact assumed, but counsel for contestant in cross-examining this witness assumes it and only asks questions pertaining to their qualifications as voters. Here not the lawyer and advocate disputes the fact—he admits it—but the judge to whom the case is referred denies that a fact is proven which the contestant admits.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. SPEER] took, I will say, a just pride in his exhibition of independence during the present Congress. I do not wish to take from him any laurels he has won in that direction; but what I complain of here is that he has become too independent; he has become independent of the evidence and the admission of the contestant. The gentleman says the register of deeds of this county contradicts the witness Johnson. I deny it so far as the evidence in this case is concerned. Mr. Johnson made a list of these voters, (marked A,) which is put in evidence; and he says, when interrogated, as follows:

Q. Do you know whether or not a list of the electors so appearing on the books and refused to vote was taken at the time each name was called, and by whom?

A. I do; the list was taken by myself at the time they were presented and I have the list in my possession now, and I took each name down as they were called, presented, and refused, as the registrar called each name from the registration book, and here is a certified copy of the original lists marked A, and is herewith filed as a part of this deposition.

Q. State whether or not you examined the ballots of each person whose name appears on this list at the time they were tendered and refused, and if you know the name of which candidate that appeared on each ballot.

(The counsel for the contestant objects because it is a leading question, because the best proof of what was on the ballots is the ballots themselves.)

A. I did examine them and that they had the name on them, "For Congress, Joseph J. Martin."

Now, all that Mr. Lamb testifies to with this list in his hand, with the registration of Goose Nest and Hamilton in his hand, is this: The following question is asked:

Take the list marked A and compare it with the registration book of Goose Nest precinct, and tell me if you find the names on the said registration book, and how they are marked there.

This was his answer:

I find all, with the exception of thirteen, marked challenged and rejected. Those thirteen I don't find on the registration book, and one I find that voted.

Q. Take the list marked A and compare it with the registration book of Hamilton precinct, and tell me if you find the names on the list on the registration books of Hamilton precinct?

A. All with the exception of twenty-one.

We do not know whether the 21 included the 13 or not; and so they are both deducted, the 13 and the 21, making 34, from the 154, leaving 120 about which there is no dispute that they were registered and offered to vote.

But it is claimed that while speaking in general terms this witness Johnson says he wrote down the names as they were called off, and for the reason there happened to be thirteen which the registrar could not find, we must conclude that Johnson swore falsely and reject his testimony. But even if Johnson's testimony is thrown aside, we have the admission of the contestant here, and that is the end of it.

I will not read the twelfth section of this statute, which has been repeatedly read, but I ask that it become a part of my remarks:

SEC. 12. Every person who shall present himself for registration shall state, under oath, how long he has continuously resided in this State, and in the county in which he offers to vote, whether he is an alien or native born, when he became twenty-one years of age, whether married or single, and where and with whom he resides. Upon the request of an elector, the registrar shall require the applicant to prove his identity or age and residence by the testimony of at least one elector, under oath. And if an elector has previously been admitted to registration in any ward, township, or precinct in the county in which he resides, he shall not be allowed to register again in another ward, precinct, or township in the same county until he produces a certificate of the registrar of the former township, ward, or precinct that said elector has removed from said township, ward, or precinct, and that his name has been erased from the registration books of the ward, township, or precinct from which he has removed; and the identity of any person claiming the right to be registered in any precinct of the same county by virtue of such certificate with the person named therein, shall be proved by the oath of the claimant, and when required by the registrar, by the oath of at least one other elector. Every person found qualified shall take the following oath: "I, ——, do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will support the Constitution of the United States and the constitution of the State of North Carolina; that I have been a resident of the State of North Carolina for twelve months, and of the county of —— for ninety days; that I am a duly qualified elector, and that I have not registered for this election in any other precinct, and that I am an actual and bona fide resident of —— township, (or precinct;) so help me God." And thereupon said person shall be permitted to register, and the date of his registration shall be noted opposite his name in the registration book.

It is to my mind too plain for argument, too plain for the evasion of the most astute mind, that the twelfth section of this statute has no application to these voters. Those whom the registrar marked opposite their names with the word "certificate" were allowed to vote, those whom the registrar had marked with a cross opposite their names were not allowed to vote. But the twelfth section applies to persons who have removed from one precinct to another and they must get a certificate under that statute that they have removed and that their names are erased and go to the precinct into which they had removed and take a personal oath before the registrar. There is no pretense that in this case the voters whose votes were received did anything of this kind, but the registrar of Goose Nest precinct obtained certificates for the democratic electors that their names had been erased, not that they had removed, but the testimony of the assistant registrar at Goose Nest precinct is that in point of fact such certificates were false; their names had never been erased. He testifies so himself. In answer to a question he says:

I did assist in writing the certificates and marking them "granted," but did not assist in erasing any of the names, as none of them are erased, but marked opposite each name, "certificate granted."

Why, sir, so far as this section of the law is concerned, the very reason assigned why these republican voters should not be allowed to vote, excludes the votes of the democratic electors. They both stand on the same footing.

These 120 electors had been duly registered at Hamilton precinct. As a matter of law, I ask lawyers on the other side of this House if they know of any case where it has ever been decided that an elector, through the manipulation or usurpation of the executive department of the government, can be disfranchised? The point I make is this: these electors once having been registered according to law, and the law having created a new precinct cutting them off from the old, not requiring any personal act on their part, could not be disfranchised by any act of the executive department of the State of North Carolina nor of any of its officers. Some years ago, in the better days of the State of Alabama, at least so far as elections are concerned, the supreme court of the State, according to McCrary, section 6, in the case of the State vs. Adams, 2 Stuart, 239, supreme court of Alabama—

Held, that no department of the government, nor all of them combined have the power to divest an individual of his constitutional right of suffrage.

Under the construction of these statutes of North Carolina, passed in 1877, this case is what lawyers term a casus omissus. Neither the sixth section nor the twelfth section in exact terms applies. But there is a fair ground to infer when the names of these voters were transferred from Hamilton back to the Goose Nest book, that under section 6 of the statute they were to all intents and purposes duly on the registration book and entitled to vote.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the contest so far on this precinct has been that these votes ought to be counted. I do not understand that any gentleman who has addressed the House in this case has denied that if through fraud, violence, intimidation, or the erroneous ruling of election officers a vote is tendered and refused, that it should be counted. It is admitted, as I understand, as a proposition of law that a vote tendered and illegally refused should, in a contest in this House, or elsewhere, be counted the same as if cast. Mr. McCrary in his work, which is cited approvingly all through the majority report, so lays down the doctrine. Now, if there ever was a case in the history of this House, and there are numerous such, where the votes of voters which have been tendered and have been refused should be counted, we have the case before us now, providing any votes cast at this poll are counted. I wish to present this precinct from another point of view. I contend that it is undeniable that if these votes are not counted, then the whole precinct should be rejected and none of its votes counted. I make that claim under this doctrine, that where from any cause, not the fault of the electors themselves, they have in considerable numbers lost their right to vote from want of registration or otherwise, through the fault of the election officers, the whole precinct must be rejected and none of its votes counted. On that point I read from McCrary on Elections, section 9:

It being conceded that the power to enact registration laws is within the power to regulate the exercise of the elective franchise and preserve the purity of the ballot, it follows that an election held in disregard of the provisions of a registration law must be held void. (44 Missouri, 347.)

Again, quoting the text:

Where, however, a portion of the voters of a given precinct are thus unjustly denied the privilege of registration, and another portion are duly registered and permitted to vote, no doubt is entertained but that the entire poll should be rejected if the votes of the former class cannot be counted, and if they are sufficiently numerous to affect the result.

Now, in this case the authority cited shows that there can be no doubt that the entire poll should be rejected. If counted or rejected the sitting member has a majority, according to the views of a majority of the Committee on Elections. The majority for the contestant at this poll was 132, and the majority of the Committee of Elections count that vote, although under the law if the other 120 who were refused were not properly registered without their fault, the whole precinct should be set aside.

Why is a precinct set aside in any case? Because of the uncertainty as to the result. Now, if you set aside South Mills precinct, Vandemere precinct, and Salem precinct, on the ground that the election officers delayed opening the polls until after the hour prescribed by law, I ask gentlemen of this committee who signed this report, I ask the lawyers on the floor of this House, by what reason can they conclude that Goose Nest precinct should be counted, when at least one hundred and twenty electors were disfranchised by no fault of their own, but by action of the election officers? There can be no good reason whatever given for any distinction. The trouble is that if you count those 120 votes or reject the whole poll, there would be an end to the case of the contestant and of all pretense that he was elected. My own opinion is that the election at this poll was wholly illegal. The election officers themselves under the law should have met on the Saturday preceding the election to hear challenges on the part of those who objected to any of the registered voters. Instead of that they did not meet until Monday in the afternoon preceding the day of election, and then decided that the electors must obtain certificates from the officers of the precinct where they were registered.

And the registrar at Goose Nest precinct, a democrat, and a friend of the contestant, rushed off with an assistant to the registrar of Hamilton precinct and obtained certificates for the democratic voters. Those voters never saw those certificates, and never registered at Goose Nest precinct by taking the oath prescribed by law.

Now, as to Merry Hill precinct and the 108 marked ballots that were cast there, I shall say but little. That matter has been discussed in all its phases, and I can add nothing new. It occurs to me that in view of what was done there, in view of the fact that this democratic judge of Bertie County, this friend of the contestant, himself, had printed and circulated these ballots in order to impose upon and defraud the colored republican voters at that poll—it occurs to me that if we were to change one letter in the name of that precinct, it would then be properly designated.

The law of North Carolina evidently contemplates and implies that the device must be put on the ballot and on the outside of the ballot by the voter himself or with his consent. Now, these electors, these colored men imposed upon by this democratic sharper, never consented to cast a ballot with anything on it that would invalidate it. The case which the statute contemplated is not made out. If you count the 108 votes, admitting all that the contestant claims and that is accorded to him by the majority of the committee at Goose Nest, then Mr. Martin has a majority of the votes in the district according to the opinion of the majority of the Committee on Elections.

Now, as to Hamilton precinct, the only ground—and I wish the members of this House to seize upon that point—the only ground upon which we are asked to exclude that poll is that Mr. Martin, the sitting member, temporarily took the place of the registrar and with his pencil checked off the names of forty or fifty voters as they came up to vote. That is all.

Instead of Mr. Martin being reprimanded for doing that, I contend here that it was an act of merit on his part, that it was done in the interest of a fair election. Had those names not been checked off the voters might have voted a second time, or others might have voted in their names. This checking is a guard against fraud, and it is immaterial who does it. It does not affect the validity of the election one particle.

The testimony upon that point has been read. Two witnesses swore that Mr. Martin acted fairly and honestly; that what he did was done above-board and in the gaze of the people standing around the poll and coming up to vote. It is an idle, flimsy pretense that any fraud was committed there, or that there is any justification for rejecting the vote cast at that poll. On the contrary, this gentleman who circulated these ballots ought to be in the penitentiary. It is the proper place for him. A gentleman who will connive, plot, scheme, combine, confederate, and conspire to steal the franchise from his fellow-man ought not to be at liberty, but he ought to be behind the iron grates and bars. Yet having robbed, as he supposed, these electors, this man, J. B. Martin, (not contestee,) solemnly and gravely asks us to be particeps criminis; he sends up the fruit of his iniquity here and asks us to receive it. Instead of giving the stamp of approval to such acts, we should set the seal of condemnation on them, and announce to the world that no man can gain a seat in this House by such methods.

Upon this subject of persons temporarily taking the place of an election officer, I desire the Clerk to read from volume 31 of the California Reports.

The Clerk read as follows:

> The irregularities complained of were the appointment by the judges of the election, and not by the electors there assembled, of a person to serve as inspector, the inspector appointed by the board of supervisors having failed to attend, and the taking of the ballots from the box and reading them to the tellers by one Heath, who was neither judge, inspector, nor clerk of the election. It appears that neither the judges nor the inspector could read and that Heath was invited by them to read the ballots for that reason. There is no pretense that by reason of these irregularities any illegal votes were cast for the respondent, or that the ballots were not read correctly by Heath, or that the contestant was not allowed in the tally all the votes that were cast for him, or that the respondent was allowed more votes than he was entitled to, or that they contributed in any manner to cause the respondent to be declared duly elected. Mere irregularities which do not affect the final result, or in other words, do not produce a different result from that which would have otherwise happened, are not vicious. Electors cannot be denied the benefit of their votes upon such slender grounds.

Mr. BISBEE. That, Mr. Speaker, is the law upon this subject entirely applicable to this case. Why the registrar was absent we do not know. It may have been on the ground of sickness in his family, or it may have been that he had taken too much of that corn-juice which the average "tar-heel" of North Carolina considers largely superior to water. In any possible view of this case the contestee is entitled to retain his seat.

Now, there has been some reluctance to hear discussion on this question. In former periods of our Government it was not thought beyond the duty of the ablest and most talented members of the House to investigate and argue at length contested-election cases. In my judgment this case is of vast importance. The questions here presented are more important than all others pending before this House. Finance, interstate commerce, postal telegraphy, and even the Morgan resolution sink into insignificance when compared with the question of the purity and freedom of the ballot. Upon this rests the corner-stone of our Government. All other questions may be postponed, but the question shall the will of the majority be overthrown through fraud, chicanery, or violence ought not be postponed. This assault made upon the contestee's title reminds us that the fate of republicans in the South has indeed been a hard one. It is a remarkable thing for a republican candidate for Congress to come here from the South with a majority on the face of the returns. This the sitting member has accomplished. What they attempted to do in North Carolina we are asked to complete here—to count him out. I appeal to members on the other side of this House who reside in more favored portions of the Union, where the law is executed, where the will of the majority prevails, where the indignant gaze of an outraged people would destroy as with fire him who attempted to thrust his wicked and criminal hand into the ballot-box—to those gentlemen I appeal by their judgment here to-day to declare to the country and to the world that the privilege of the elective franchise shall be maintained, that law and order and the prosperity that flows from them shall not be overthrown in any portion of our common country.

Perhaps the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] the other day criticised too severely these democratic managers. I wish to remind him and the House that some progress has been made even in the State of North Carolina. The crimes revealed in this record are less enormous than the crimes and scenes depicted in the "Fool's Errand" and "Bricks Without Straw." Leading republicans in North Carolina are no longer executed under the decree of the Ku-Klux Klan. Then it was the man, now it is the ballot that is murdered. But the testimony justifies the conclusion that democratic election officers have connived, plotted, and conspired, to prevent a correct expression of the popular will. The political friends of contestant, Mr. Yeates, have printed and circulated what they believed to be illegal republican tickets, for the purpose of defrauding illiterate colored republican voters. They have delayed opening the polls at republican precincts, to furnish a pretext for rejecting returns. They have attempted to manipulate registration laws so as to receive the ballots of democrats and exclude those of republicans. While not so glaring and flagrant, the majority of the House propose to make them just as effective for a political purpose as other frauds and crimes upon the elective franchise in many of the congressional districts of the South, which democratic public sentiment still sustains and approves of. After the election in the second Florida district in 1878, the friends of a defeated candidate, in order to count him in, destroyed the precinct returns in Brevard County and forged others in their stead, giving him 194 more votes than were cast for him, and this, too, in a county that had never cast a larger total vote than 169. At the same election, in Marion County, democratic officers substituted 93 democratic ballots for a like number of republican ballots at one poll. At another poll, in Madison County, where the republican candidate for Congress received 57 majority, the return was destroyed, and the ballot-box with its contents burnt up; and in the same county, at another poll, 200 republicans were forcibly prevented from voting, and the chief of those who performed this last piece of iniquity was honored in 1880 with a democratic nomination for State senator; and though defeated, he and three members of the State Assembly were counted in, and took part in the late election of United States Senator. In Alachua County, Florida, in 1878, the county canvassing board rejected three precinct returns, which gave the republican candidate for Congress 470 majority, which returns the supreme court of the State unanimously decided to be regular and perfect, and which the Committee on Elections of this House and the House itself have unanimously decided to be good and valid returns, and that the canvassing board did not possess the power to exclude them; and the gentleman who counseled and advised this flagrant wrong, an ex-circuit judge of the State and a learned lawyer, while under indictment for it in the Federal court, was made one of the democratic presidential electors to represent the sentiment of "a full and free ballot and an honest count."

In the first congressional district in Florida, in 1878, from one poll in Escambia County, where the total number of registered voters was but 53, and 18 of those were republican, the democratic inspectors returned a democratic majority of 102 votes. At the same election, in the county of Jefferson, 1,400 colored republican electors went to the polls to vote, and were denied the right on the pretense that their names had been stricken from the registration book by the arbitrary and criminal action of a democratic board of county commissioners. In this congressional district, in 1878, the names of republican voters were corruptly stricken from the registration books and their votes were refused or destroyed by fraud to the extent of 3,000; and thus two democratic Congressmen were counted in and certified elected from the State of Florida—and one of them still occupies a seat on this floor—neither of whom had any more right to it than the captain of a privateer has to the plunder which his piratical crew have captured and stolen from their innocent and helpless victims. And yet no democratic leader denounces the infamy of their crimes, or even feels a sense of shame at their commission.

The Legislature of Florida, increased in number and apportioned in utter disregard of a plain constitutional provision—an illegal Legislature beyond the shadow of any doubt in the eye of the law—many members of it being elected through shameless and stupendous ballot-box stuffing and other flagrant frauds, recently elected a United States Senator, and this Senator-elect, knowing full well the truth of what I have stated, that the Legislature was apportioned in palpable violation of a clear constitutional provision for purely partisan purposes, that large numbers of that Legislature were returned elected over the dead and prostrate form of hundreds and thousands of republican votes—that the election was a farce, a mockery, and a sham—conscious of all this, he, the Senator-elect, commenced an address before that Legislature, so constituted and elected, in the following words:

> I congratulate you and the people of this Republic that we are still permitted to employ some of the old agencies and methods necessary to a free and fair expression of the public will.

Such is the key-note of a speech to a legislative body by a leader of modern democracy which is to-day the representative of successful fraud and triumphant usurpation. I repeat, democratic public sentiment not only does not condemn, but rewards with elevation to office the perpetrators of high crimes upon the ballot-box and upon the principles of representative government.

The democratic majority here have decreed that the only republican member who was certified elected from thirteen Southern States must be turned out to meet a political exigency.

Hard indeed has been the fate of republicans in the South. But we do not despair. The eradication of error and the growth of truth is slow. To acclimate republican principles in the Southern States has been as difficult a task as the growth of a plant from the north pole under a tropical sun. The provisions of equal rights, equal laws, and equal justice in the Constitution still nourish our hopes of a brighter and better future. Happily, despite fraud in the South and forgery in the North, by the signal victory won by the splendid courage of the constituents of this side of the House, we have been rescued for a time from that fathomless abyss upon the verge of which we stood last November. Tremblingly and with bated breath we waited the sound of that knell that might "summon us to heaven or to hell." But, notwithstanding the national victory achieved, the glorious light that shines out from the northern and western skies still reaches the South with enfeebled and diminished rays, and in the words of the matchless eloquence of our President-elect, we demand that the "sun of liberty fixed in the firmament of the Constitution shall shine with equal rays upon the black man and upon the white man," in the South as well as in the North. Every advance taken by the Chief Magistrate of this nation, every messenger sent out bearing the olive branch of peace and reconciliation, which we all so ardently pray for, has been met with a blow in the face.

We of the South believe the democratic party is one gigantic conspiracy to nullify or defeat the late amendments of the Constitution and the laws passed to execute the same. For ten years it has played the role of hypocrisy, by which the country has been deceived and misled, until it gained control of both branches of Congress. Has not the mask been torn off yet? Does not the most confiding optimist yet see the horrid front which it concealed? Does any one need further evidence?

Within four years the country has been startled by two bold attempts at revolution, one to unseat a President duly declared elected, and the other to starve him into submission to the demands of the democratic party. And we are to-day confronted with the possibilities of a third, for which the pending measure is but the prelude to the scenes that may be subsequently enacted.

If the threatened storm shall pass over, and we reach the ides of March in safety, if sixteen years of residence in the South has taught me anything, I warn the President-elect and the country to beware of unmanly sycophancy, and that "bending of the suppliant hinges of the knee that thrift may follow fawning," which, if again trusted, will develop a type of perfidy compared with which the character of Iago is the portrayal of a saint.

Mr. Speaker, on such slender grounds as this case presents I do not believe a member from a Northern State would be unseated. Public sentiment would not be so insulted. In fidelity to the principles of their party the republicans in the Southern States have not been surpassed by any of their political brethren in other portions of the Union. The hard and unequal contest which they have made was forced upon them by the logic of events, and they could not escape it. They have been falsely accused, traduced, and villified by a partisan press incapable of telling the truth of a political opponent. But when passion and intolerance shall no longer rule the hour, when the sacrifice made, persecutions suffered, odium and ostracism endured, and the heroic courage displayed by southern republicans that the tree of liberty might live and flourish on the soil of the South shall be appreciated, the friends of human rights and of popular government will erect a monument to their memory whose summit shall pierce the skies and which will endure forever.

Mr. SPEER. I now call the previous question.

Mr. CALKINS and Mr. VAN VOORHIS, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD remarks on the pending election case. [See Appendix.]

Mr. FIELD. If the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. SPEER] will withdraw for a moment the demand for the previous question, I will move as a substitute for the pending resolutions the resolutions submitted by the minority of the committee. The gentleman can then demand the previous question on both sets of resolutions.

Mr. SPEER. If we adopt the majority resolutions there will be no need of voting on those of the minority; and if the majority resolutions fail, then we can adopt those of the minority.

Mr. KEIFER. It is customary in all these cases to allow the minority resolutions to be moved.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands the gentleman from Georgia to decline to yield for that purpose.

Mr. KEIFER. I think the gentleman from Georgia does not understand, perhaps, that the motion indicated by the gentleman from Massachusetts is always allowed in cases of this kind.

Mr. SPEER. The minority resolutions are in, of course.

Mr. FIELD. If it be understood that the question is pending on both sets of resolutions, that is all we desire.

Mr. SPEER. It is understood that the minority resolutions are in.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The substitute of the gentleman from Massachusetts is in, and the question is on the demand for the previous question.

Mr. MANNING. Is it not on both propositions?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Yes; on the substitute as well as the original resolution.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. SPEER moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. SPEER. I now yield such portion of the hour remaining to me to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BELTZHOOVER] as he shall desire.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. Mr. Speaker, this case comes before the House on the majority and minority reports of the Committee on Elections. The majority report was adopted in committee by the votes of nine members, and the omission of two gentlemen to sign it was merely accidental. The minority report is signed by five members of the committee. One gentleman did not vote in the committee, and did not sign either report. On these reports and the able arguments of the distinguished gentlemen who presented them we were willing to rest the determination of the case. The gentlemen on the other side of the House did not concur, however, in our disposition to come to a speedy vote, but have consumed about five hours in their effort to sustain the minority report. In addition, therefore, to the hour taken by my colleague, [Mr. SPEER,] who wrote the majority report and opened the case, I will ask the indulgence of the House during the remaining hour to present, as briefly and as plainly as I can, the propositions of fact and law on which that report is founded, and by which it seems to me to be clearly sustained.

This contest arises out of the election for Congressman which was held on November 5, 1878, in the first congressional district of the State of North Carolina. In 1874 this district elected the democratic candidate for Congress by a majority of 1,000 over both his competitors and a plurality of about fourteen hundred over the one having the next highest vote. In 1876 the democratic candidate was again chosen by a majority of 1,200, and in 1880 the democratic candidate had over five hundred majority. In 1878 we have the anomaly presented of two republican candidates running, and therefore dividing the republican vote, against a concededly popular democratic candidate, who polled his full party vote, and yet one of these republican candidates is certified as receiving a plurality of 51votes. This fact is one which we call attention to on the threshold of this case. It was doubtless one of the controlling circumstances which led to the investigation which resulted in the contest. Mr. Yeates, the contestant, upon inquiry and examination, ascertained that there had been the grossest irregularities and misconduct and fraud on the part of the election boards in four election precincts in the district, namely: At South Mills precinct, in Camden County; at Vandemere precinct, in Pamlico County; at Hamilton precinct, in Martin County; and at Providence precinct, in Pasquotank County. Mr. Martin, the contestee, in response to the notice of contest, alleged that irregularities and informalities had occurred at Salem precinct, in Pasquotank County; at Merry Hill precinct, in Bertie County; and at Goose Nest precinct, in Martin County. The testimony and arguments on both sides were confined to these seven precincts. Before the contest had proceeded far in the discussion before the committee, however, it was conceded by the contestee and his counsel that a majority of 39 votes, which had been given for contestant in Providence precinct, but which had not been returned and counted for him, should be added to his vote, and thereby reduce the returned plurality of the contestee from 51 to 12. The sitting member, therefore, holds his seat from a strong democratic district, which before and since the election in controversy uniformly elected democrats, by the very slender plurality of 12 votes. This, therefore, is the point from which we start in the investigation of the case. The contestee has 12 plurality, and there are three disputed precincts on each side. We will begin with the examination of the contestant's case, and consider first the precinct of South Mills. At this precinct the contestee had 64 plurality, which the majority report of the Committee on Elections concludes should be rejected from the count for the following reasons:

1. The polls, which should have been opened at seven o'clock, were not opened until ten o'clock, and, in addition to the three hours for voting thus already lost, the board adjourned for an hour or more at noon.

2. The election board, instead of being constituted of four persons, was composed of only two, and these were not sworn.

3. The election board thus illegally constituted and unsworn were guilty of gross irregularities in the conduct of the election, and one of them was drunk.

We will consider these objections in their order. The election law of North Carolina of 1877 provides in section 16 that "the polls shall be opened on the day of election from seven o'clock in the morning until sunset of the same day, and no longer." This language is as clearly mandatory and imperative as it could be, and leaves no discretion to the election boards to open the polls at a later hour than seven o'clock, and particularly inhibits any adjournment of the election or closing of the polls after they are open, before sunset. The authorities on this subject all hold that the provisions of law which fix the time and place of elections are mandatory and not directory, (20 Pennsylvania, 484; 366 Ibid., 333,) and a disregard of these will be fatal unless the party claiming the votes shows that the parties legally entitled to vote actually voted. Mr. McCrary, the most eminent authority on the subject of election law, says that "time and place are of the substance of every election." The same author further says:

> The better opinion seems to be that a considerable deviation from the hours fixed by law for keeping open the polls must render the election void. Thus, in Pennsylvania, it has been determined that where the law required the polls to be kept open until ten o'clock and they were closed at eight, the election must be set aside. (Pennsylvania District Election, 2 Parsons, 526.) So also if they be opened at a much later hour than the time prescribed by law.

And in summing up the conclusions, in view of the authorities on this point, he declares:

> From all the somewhat conflicting authorities upon this subject the following may be gathered as the governing rule:
> If the deviation from the legal hours is great, or even considerable, the presumption will be that it has affected the result and the burden will be upon him who seeks to uphold the election to show affirmatively that it has not.

In the case of Chadwick vs. Melvin, (Brightly, E. C. 251,) Chief-Justice Thompson, of the supreme court of Pennsylvania, held that "if the polls be opened at a much later hour than that prescribed by law, the entire poll must be rejected." In view of the facts and these authorities it was clearly incumbent on the contestee, if he desired to retain the majority given him at this precinct, to have shown that the contestant did not suffer by the very considerable deviation from the proper time for opening the polls and by the adjournment of the election board for an hour or more at noon. The contestee has not attempted to repel the presumption of unfairness by any testimony, and he therefore cannot complain of the conclusion of the majority of the committee. But adding the second and third objections, which we will next examine together, to the first, the conclusion justified by that becomes inevitable. The election law of 1877 referred to above, in section 9, provides that—

> The board of justices of the peace for each county, on or before the first Monday of the month next preceding the month in which each election is held, shall appoint four judges or inspectors of elections, two of whom shall be of a different political party, when possible, from the registrars, at each place of holding election in their respective counties. The said judges of election shall attend at the places for which they are severally appointed, on the day of election, and they, together with the registrars for such precincts or townships, who shall attend with the registration books, after being sworn by some justice of the peace, or other person authorized to administer oaths, to conduct the election fairly and impartially according to the constitution and laws of the State, shall open the polls and superintend the same until the close of the election.

This law plainly provides that there shall be four judges of election for each election precinct; that they and the registrar shall be sworn by some justice or person authorized to administer oaths; that they shall attend at the polls on the day of election and open and conduct the election. Let us see what occurred at South Mills precinct and how the requirements of the law were complied with. The testimony plainly shows:

First. That at ten o'clock Sheriff Sawyer, who was a mere intruder and not sworn, opened the polls.

Second. That only two judges, instead of four, were present, and these were sworn by Sawyer, who was not authorized to administer oaths, and whose act was therefore a nullity.

Third. That the republican judge, named Overton, who sat at the window and received and handled the votes, was drunk all day.

Fourth. That notwithstanding the loss of three hours in opening the polls and that seven hundred and sixty-four names were on the registry of voters, all entitled to vote that day, this unsworn, illegal, and drunken board adjourned and closed the election for an hour or more at noon.

Fifth. That when the board adjourned at noon they put the ballot-box in the custody of Overton, the drunken judge, who had complete control of it during the time the polls were closed.

Sixth. That voters were offered bribes of money and place to support the contestee. Barrington, a witness called, testifies:

> Q. Were you told by any one prior to the day of the election that Mr. Kehoe, of the republican executive committee of the State of North Carolina, was going to send down $2,500 for electioneering purposes, and that a portion of that sum would be sent to you?
> A. I was. I was told by Joseph J. Martin that Mr. Kehoe was going to send down $2,500 to him [Martin] for electioneering purposes, and that he [Martin] would send some of it to me, and wanted me to do all I could with it in his interest.—Record, page 33.

In this instance Mr. Martin, the contestee, directly offered a money bribe to the witness, who was a prominent and influential colored voter, to support him.

This same witness, further on, says that one A. P. Cherry (a deputy United States collector of internal revenue) offered the witness the office of census-taker if he would vote for the contestee. He also says (page 32) that the same offer was made to several others on same conditions. On the same page he further says:

> I saw papers addressed to colored voters and signed by C. Gurkin, who was chairman of the republican executive committee of the first congressional district of North Carolina, in which he promises that Joseph J. Martin will pay them money if they will vote for him (Martin) and do all they could to procure his election. I know, also, that Joseph J. Martin made offers to pay money to other voters if they would vote for him and do all they could for him at said election.

Same witness, on same page, states that "it was circulated among the colored voters, about a week or ten days before the election, that if the colored voters would unite and elect Joseph J. Martin to Congress, that he (Martin,) if elected, would cause the lands of the white people to be sold, and that they (the colored people, or voters,) would have a chance to buy them," and the witness said that "many said to me that that was one of the reasons that would induce them to vote for Joseph J. Martin."

In answer to these grave charges Mr. Martin, the contestee, has not put in one word of denial, either himself or by calling witnesses. And here I desire to call attention to the statement of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. KEIFER,] who said in his speech on this case the day before yesterday that the registrars and officers of election who acted illegally and fraudulently were democrats, and that the judge of election, Overton, who was drunk, was a democrat. When he said that, he made a statement which the record in this case does not sustain. This election officer, Mr. Overton, was a republican official, and Mr. Wilcox, in the Salem precinct, was a republican registrar; and most of the polls where these frauds were committed, where these irregularities and illegalities and disregard of law took place, were controlled by republican officials.

Mr. KEIFER. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. I hope the gentleman will not interrupt me unless I misstated his remarks.

Mr. KEIFER. I want to set the gentleman right. What precinct is that to which he refers where the registrar was a republican?

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. I refer to Salem precinct.

Mr. KEIFER. And the registrar himself swears he was a democrat.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. I say that the man who acted there in that capacity was a republican, and this judge of election who was drunk was a republican.

Mr. MANNING. The gentleman from Ohio stated on yesterday that Mr. Overton was a democrat. That is not sustained by the testimony and the record.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Overton was not the registrar at that precinct. I was speaking of the registrars.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. I cannot, Mr. Speaker, in the brief time allotted to this side of the House against the five hours consumed by gentlemen on the other side, allow any interruption, for I will not misstate a single fact as shown by this record. I have made a careful investigation of this testimony, and I assure gentlemen on the other side, as well as on this side of the House, that the statements which I make are correct.

Mr. KEIFER. Now, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. I cannot submit to interruption, Mr. Speaker. I did not interrupt the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. KEIFER. I stated, and I desire to repeat it, that every one of the registrars appointed at that election was a democrat.

Mr. MANNING. It is very remarkable that the gentleman from Ohio will insist that Mr. Wilcox was a democrat when the proof shows that he was a republican, and Mr. Overton also.

Mr. KEIFER. I stated very plainly in my speech that Mr. Wilcox was a republican, and I stated further that every registrar at that election was a democrat.

Mr. MANNING. And you stated that Mr. Overton was a democrat when you had the proof before you to show that he was a republican.

Mr. KEIFER. I spoke very plainly of the registrars at that election as being democrats.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair desires to state to the gentleman from Ohio that the gentleman from Pennsylvania declines to be interrupted.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. I would gladly yield, Mr. Speaker, for a correction or for a question by any gentleman not a member of the Committee on Elections and who is not informed by the record in this case. But I am compelled to reply in an hour to the speeches of gentlemen on the other side which occupied five hours and I must go on to do anything like justice to the case. When the gentleman from Ohio made his misstatements and spoke or claimed to speak from the record, I asserted in correction of these errors that the registrar at Salem was a republican sheriff and the drunken inspector at South Mills was a republican, and I stated the facts as shown by the record in this case and which no gentleman cognizant of them will attempt to controvert.

Again, these two inspectors, or judges, this drunken one and the sober one, and the registrars not only violated the law in not opening the polls until ten o'clock, but with the registry in their hands showing that 764 votes were to be polled which would require all the time allowed that day for the election and notwithstanding that three hours had been lost in the morning, they adjourned the election at South Mills at 12 o'clock and went to dinner and staid away an hour, taking out of the ten hours allowed the electors of that district four hours of the time they were entitled to and ought to have had to enable them to poll all the votes there. Further, it is conclusively shown by the testimony that they thus acted not only in defiance of their duty and of the law, but when they went to dinner they committed the ballot-box containing the votes to the custody of the drunken republican judge of election and he took it in his possession and locked it up and kept the key himself for an hour in defiance of their duty, in defiance of the law.

Another witness, too, testifies that he was tendered the office of census enumerator if he would vote and act for Mr. Martin. The testimony not only shows fraud and bribery and irregularity and negligence, but also intimidation all through that precinct over the colored vote; for the contestee and his party friends, as my colleague suggests, broke up the school of this colored school-teacher, Barrington, because he did not submit to the domination and intimidation of the contestee and his friends in this election. Now, then, taking the plainly prescribed rule of law, that where the deviation from the legal hour of opening the polls is great, and adding to it the fact that they adjourned an hour at dinner, and further, the irregularities, frauds, and misconduct of these election officers, I hold that it becomes infinitely more strongly the duty of this House to throw upon Mr. Martin, the contestee, the burden of showing that at this precinct the contestant suffered no harm.

Instead of Mr. Martin, the contestee, showing this, however, as he was bound to do, the proof of the contestant shows clearly that out of the registry of 764 votes there were only polled in that precinct 390 votes, leaving of the votes unpolled almost one-half of the registered votes, which was the direct result, as the committee concluded, of the shortness of the time and the misconduct of these officers in conducting the election; and for the reason that the majority of the committee believed there was not a free, full vote and a fair election, they concluded unanimously that this poll should not be counted against the conestant in this case.

In addition to the law cited on the first objection above, the authorities pertinent to the second and third objections are full and clear. It was ruled in the well-considered case of Thompson vs. Ewing (1 Brewster, 99) that "an election must be conducted by the proper officers, and an election held by mere intenders and without title or color of title may be disregarded." The decisions of this House on the same point in contested-election cases are also numerous. Among others may be cited the contested-election case of Howard vs. Cooper, Thirty-sixth Congress, (see Contested Elections, 1864-'65, page 282,) wherein the Committee on Elections say:

> Your committee have rejected the vote of the township of Van Buren. The law requires that the board of inspectors shall be constituted of three persons in number. The proof is clear that there were but two. And as there was no board of inspectors known to the law, your committee see no way by which any legal effect can be given to the returned vote. They have therefore deducted it.

In the case of James Jackson vs. General Anthony Wayne, (Clark & Hall, page 47,) a Georgia case, decided in 1791, it was held that "where the law requires three magistrates to preside at an election and a return was made by three persons, two of whom were not magistrates, the return was defective;" and the vote of the county was rejected.

In the case of Rufus Easton vs. John Scott, (Clark & Hall, page 272,) a Missouri case, decided in 1816, held, "if an election is required by law to be held by three judges, who are required to be sworn, and it is held by two not sworn, their proceedings are irregular, and the votes taken by them are to be rejected."

We come next to the Vandemere precinct, where the contestant had 40 plurality. At this precinct the polls were not opened until twelve o'clock. Two of the judges or inspectors were absent. The republican electors by a conspiracy in refusing to act under the law delayed the appointment of inspectors or judges of election up till noon of that day. The law requires that where election inspectors are appointed by the registrar he shall appoint an equal number of each party. In this case, after the registrar had appointed the democratic inspector he could not get from the whole number of people there one to admit that he was a republican and serve as an election officer at that precinct, although the very men whom he offered to appoint as inspectors and judges afterward voted and worked for the contestee. Now, this was a democratic precinct and by reason of this failure to open the polls at twelve o'clock twenty-five or thirty electors are shown to have gone home, thereby losing their votes, and to have told their neighbors that there would be no election held at that precinct. Out of the registry of 167 votes 102 only were polled, leaving 65 votes at home, which the testimony of two witnesses, Holton and Gatlin, proves were democratic votes. They both swear that the republican vote was all brought out, but that the democratic vote was not voted, and that many of the democratic voters after coming there went home on account of this delay in the opening of the polls. By this delay the voters of this precinct were allowed only five hours instead of ten hours, which the law fixes as the time within which they can exercise the right of suffrage.

Now, the law as applicable to South Mills is still more apposite to this case. Here the detention was not only to ten o'clock but to twelve o'clock of the day of election; and the burden of proof—although the contestant assumed to show that he suffered—the burden of proof was on the contestee to show that no harm resulted to the contestant by reason of this gross irregularity and great deviation from the time fixed by law for opening the polls.

Mr. WILSON. What did he show?

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. The contestee showed nothing. The contestant showed that the whole vote of the republicans was out and voted and that it was a democratic precinct; but that of the democratic voters a considerable number came there and went home without voting, and many others were kept at home by reason of these reports that there would be no election. Would it be a free, fair, honest election where the polls are opened at twelve o'clock when the law requires that they shall be opened at seven? Is it a fair, free election when the electors are entitled in a precinct to have ten hours to vote to give them but five? Is it a fair, free election where electors come and stay away from their business in order to vote until nearly noon and then go home because their business calls them, thereby losing their own votes, and tell their neighbors there is not going to be an election, thereby preventing their neighbors from coming to the polls?

We next come to the Hamilton precinct. The law of North Carolina provides that "no person who is a candidate for any office shall be a registrar, or judge, or inspector of an election." That is a clear, mandatory, imperative inhibition against any one acting as an inspector, judge, or registrar in an election in which he is running as a candidate. It is one of the immutable principles fixed in the jurisprudence of every civilized country that no man shall be the judge of his own case. And if this House desires to preserve the purity of the ballot-box as the bulwark of civil liberty and free institutions, it is their duty to see that this fundamental principle which governs all civilized nations and all judicial tribunals and all intelligent men in their action shall not be violated in this case. Mr. Martin, the contestee, did not live in this precinct. He came down twelve miles from his own voting place and went to the polls at Hamilton and took charge of the registration of voters, and he remained there until one-seventh of that whole vote was cast, fifty or more votes. I need not read the testimony which was read in your hearing by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. SPEER] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FIELD] who was extremely fair in all that he said in this case.

The committee hold that this precinct should be rejected, first, for the reason that this contestee, who was a candidate for the high office of Congressman, came over there and acted as registrar and had charge of the registration during the polling of fifty or one-seventh of the whole number of votes cast; second, because while he acted as registrar he was not only not sworn, but he was not appointed nor asked to act. He boldly and impudently and in defiance of law and justice and decency forced himself into the election board. In none of the cases on this subject, where candidates acted as election officers in their own election, does it occur that the man so acting was not a sworn officer of election acting at least under the sanction and solemnity of an oath. At this election there was no one running but Yeates and Martin, and it was therefore a worse case than that of Boileau, which occurred in Philadelphia, and is reported in Parsons' Select Equity Cases, volume 2, page 503. In that case, while Coxe was running for the office of assessor of elections he acted for a time as clerk of the board of elections. Boileau was running for alderman on the same ticket. On the ground that Coxe was acting as an officer at that election while running for another little office, it was contended and argued with great force and great ability, although unsuccessfully, that Boileau's election was avoided. The ground on which the court allowed the election of Boileau to stand was, that although Coxe's election would have been avoided, Boileau, not running for the same office, could not come within the same inhibition which would avoid the other. In view of these facts, what was the plain duty of Mr. Martin in this case?

Charged as he was with the violation of a fundamental principle of the law, was it not for him to come forward and show affirmatively that no wrong was done, that no votes were improperly influenced, that all the votes were correctly recorded and counted, and that the poll list corresponded with the votes? He should have shown that the utmost bona fide had controlled his conduct in this matter; that no wrong had been done to the contestant by his acting.

Now, the Committee on Elections, finding that he was silent as the grave, neither answering himself nor calling witnesses as to his misconduct, believed that his silence and indifference justified them in excluding the votes at this precinct. Mr. Martin, the sitting member, so far exceeded the decencies and proprieties of a candidate for Congress, and so violated the law, that it is confidently submitted that it would not be becoming in this House or right to count the vote of that precinct in this election.

It is proper to say that two of the members of the majority of the committee expressed a doubt as to whether this poll should be excluded, but on everything else, as I have said, the report was unanimous. If the result of the election depended upon this poll it may have been a question which would have influenced some other members of the committee in passing upon it. But with 64 votes at South Mills precinct, and with 39 votes at Vandemere precinct the contestant is elected by a majority of over 50, without counting the vote at Hamilton precinct.

Now I will turn to the precincts which were attacked by the contestee in this case. First, we have the Salem precinct. The contestee insists that there were 135 votes cast for him at this precinct which were not returned, but which were excluded by the board of canvassers. That precinct, with Providence precinct, is in Pasquotank County, and the board of canvassers for that county make this decree in reference to the Providence and Salem precincts:

> The votes, as returned by the board of canvassers from the precincts of Salem and Providence, were not received and counted by the board on account of informality, and therefore not counted in the above statement.

"The above statement" referred to was the general return of the county. Now it is contended that because Providence precinct has been counted for the contestant, giving him 39 votes, for the same reason Salem precinct should be counted. But, as my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. SPEER,] very ably said, although Providence precinct was rejected for informality, the same Salem precinct, it was not for the same informality.

Providence precinct was rejected because the registrar of election, instead of one of the election board, carried the returns up to the county board. This was a mere trivial, unessential deviation from what seems to be the strict letter of the law. Beyond that there was no informality at Providence precinct.

But when we come to consider the grounds on which Salem precinct was rejected by the board of canvassers, we find, added to that, five different and distinct reasons, which I will proceed to give. The first is, that at Salem precinct, where the republican sheriff acted as registrar, the polls were not opened until twelve o'clock, and not until after twenty-five or thirty persons plainly proven to have been there to vote had gone away.

Secondly, it is proven that this Sheriff Wilcox, a republican sheriff and a violent partisan friend of Mr. Martin, who boasts that during his life he has held all the offices in the gift of the people of that neighborhood, and therefore should be presumed to understand distinctly the duties of an election officer, went and obtained the appointment of himself as registrar in the absence, on account of sickness, of the registrar who had been previously chosen. To secure this appointment Wilcox went to a justice of the peace, and with the full knowledge that a registrar of election should be under the law sworn to do his duty, he came away from the very presence of that justice of the peace without having taken the oath prescribed.

Now, why would a man who knows the law go and get an appointment as an election officer and act as we have shown this republican registrar in this case has acted, in violation of the law, without being sworn as the law prescribes, if he had not in his heart at the time of his appointment a purpose of committing the irregularities which have been charged? In addition to this, he was appointed by only one justice of the peace, while the law he well knew required the appointment to be made by two justices.

We contend, therefore, that he acted corruptly in not being sworn when he had a chance to be sworn. Now, what else did he do? He came back to the polls and assumed himself to swear in the other officers of election without the slightest authority to administer an oath. Therefore it was that the board of election at Salem precinct, which vote gentlemen want counted, was not only a violent partisan board run by this republican sheriff, but not a single officer of it was sworn according to law. There was no responsibility of an oath resting on those officers.

Now I wish to call the attention of gentlemen to the fact that the object of the oath of election officers required by the law is that they may be convicted of perjury if they fail in their duties, as they did in this case. But when they failed to take the oath they assumed no responsibility beyond that of any other citizen under the criminal law.

In this case there was no sanction of an oath thrown around the ballot-box, but an irresponsible republican officer, the sheriff of the county, without himself being sworn when he had the opportunity to be, took charge of the polls, and, as I will show you, Mr. Yeates lost in this precinct 102 votes, or more than two-thirds of the democratic vote usually polled at that precinct.

It was shown by testimony that Mr. Yeates ran ahead of his ticket in every precinct in that county, and in every county in the district, while Mr. Martin, it is incontestibly shown, ran behind his ticket. Coming then to this precinct, we find that in 1876 Mr. Yeates, who was then a candidate, had 103 votes and his competitor had 201 votes, giving his competitor a majority of 68. Coming down to 1878, and taking this poll as returned, Mr. Yeates has 29 votes and Mr. Martin 164. In that election Mr. Yeates lost, therefore, as we have stated above, 102 votes, while Mr. Martin, engineered by this republican sheriff registrar, lost only 37 votes. Why, this very registrar himself swears that the democratic vote at this precinct was 100 or thereabout, yet under his management of that election-poll there were cast for Mr. Yeates only 29 votes.

Now for the reason, first, that the electors had only five instead of ten hours to vote, for the reason that the officers were not sworn in this case, for the reason that Mr. Yeates suffered out of all proportion when compared with the other precincts in that county and that district, the committee believe, and they are sustained incontrovertibly by the testimony, that there was not a fair, free, full election in that precinct.

We were not asked to count the vote. We were asked to reverse the decision of the canvassing board who declined to count it. The committee believe, with these facts before them justifying the canvassing board in rejecting those votes, that this House sitting as a court to review this case would not be justified in reversing the decision of the canvassing board and counting this vote.

Now Mr. Speaker, we come to this much-discussed and little-understood precinct of Merry Hill. At that precinct it is contended the board of election threw out of the count 108 votes which had been polled for Mr. Martin, the sitting member. I do not believe that any lawyer of this House who has any regard for his reputation will contend that the conclusion of the committee was not correct.

I will quote the language of the committee's argument on this point:

> The committee come to this conclusion with much reluctance. The reasoning, however, which leads to this conclusion is unanswerable, and under the statute leaves the committee no discretion.
> One hundred and eight votes for Mr. Martin were thrown out and not counted, because they had on them the words "republican ticket," at or near the head of the ticket, on the same side as the name of the candidate and office. They were thrown out on the ground that the words "republican ticket" were a device within the meaning of the laws of North Carolina. Mr. Martin contends that these ballots should be counted for him.
> Section 18, chapter 275 of the laws of North Carolina, 1877, provides:
> "The ballots shall be on white paper and may be printed or written, or partly written and partly printed, and shall be without device."
> "SEC. 20. When the election shall be finished the registrars and judges of election, in the presence of such of the electors as may choose to attend, shall open the boxes and count the ballots, reading aloud the names of the persons who shall appear on each ticket; and if there shall be two or more tickets rolled up together, or any ticket shall contain the names of more persons than such elector has a right to vote for, or shall have a device upon it, in either of these cases such tickets shall not be numbered in taking the ballots, but shall be void, and the said counting of votes shall be continued without adjournment until completed and the result thereof declared."
> If these words constitute a device within the meaning of the law, the statute is plain that the ballots are void and are not to be counted. The counsel for the contestee, while denying that these words constitute a device, contends also that being on the inside of the ticket the case is within the decision of Drulinger vs. The State, (29 Indiana, 308,) and Napier vs. Mayhew, (35 Indiana, 275.) See McCrary, § 404; Neff vs. Shanks, (Forty-third Congress.)
> The statutes of Indiana provide:
> "SEC. 18. When any person offers to vote, the inspector shall pronounce his name in an audible voice, and if there be no objection he shall receive his ballot, and in the presence of the other judges put the same unopened into the ballot-box, when the name of such elector shall be again distinctly repeated by one of the other judges in the presence of the clerks.
> "SEC. 23. That all ballots which may be cast at any election hereafter held in this State shall be written or printed on plain white paper, without any distinguishing marks or other embellishment thereon, except the name of the candidates and the office for which they are voted for, and inspectors of elections shall refuse all ballots offered of any other description: Provided, Nothing herein shall disqualify the voter from writing his own name on the back thereof."
> The Indiana statute requires the inspector to put the ballot into the ballot-box unopened, and that the ballot shall be without any distinguishing marks or other embellishment thereon, and that the inspectors of election shall refuse all ballots offered of any other description. Under this statute the Indiana court held that the words "city union ticket" on the inside of the ballot, even if it be conceded that these words constitute a distinguishing mark, did not render the ballot void, and that the object of the act was accomplished by requiring all ballots to be uniform in external appearance. The same question was decided in Stanley vs. Manley, (33 Indiana, 275,) where the words were "republican ticket" on the inside of the ballot. Under the Indiana statute the court say that the statute "does not authorize the inspector and judges to reject a ballot upon the discovery of such a mark or embellishment at the time of counting out the ballots which could not be seen by the inspectors at the time it was voted." The North Carolina statute is express that the ballots shall be without device, and that if the ticket shall have a device upon it it shall not be numbered in taking the ballots, but shall be void. This difference in the statutes renders the Indiana decisions inapplicable, and the sole question is, are the words "republican ticket" on the inside of a ballot a device within the meaning of the North Carolina statute? With the policy of the statute we have nothing to do; one purpose of the statute may have been to prevent bystanders from knowing from observation how the voters voted. No statute can altogether prevent this; experts can easily distinguish between different kinds of white papers, and the printing of ballots of the opposite parties would ordinarily be done at different printing offices with different type and ink, and the arrangement of the names of the persons and of the office, the punctuation, and the place on the ticket of the printed matter would ordinarily be different and apparent to a well-trained eye. The intention of the statute could be easily evaded if it did not also prescribe the size of the ticket and the size of the type, which the North Carolina statute has not done. Still the statute, such as it, must be enforced, even if some provisions have been omitted that are necessary completely to effectuate its intention.

Another purpose of the statute may have been to compel, as far as is possible, the voter to select the persons he votes for independently of any contrivances on the ticket calculated to inform or misinform him of the opinions of the persons voted for, because devices are often contrived to mislead. Either way, we think that words prominently printed on a ticket and intended to designate or describe it, and which have a distinct meaning in themselves, such as, if untrue, might mislead the voter, and whether true or untrue would render the ticket easily distinguishable, must be held to be a device within the meaning of the law. (McCrary on Elections, § 401.) These votes were rejected by the State authorities, and we think rightfully.

Gentlemen may appeal to passion and prejudice; they may contend that great fundamental principles of law should be disregarded because they seem to be mere technicalities, or perhaps lead to apparent improper payments of salaries. In reply to the last suggestion, I say that the gentleman from Texas, when he casts his reproaches at this side of the House and talks about unseating a member at the end of the term, and thereby paying from the Treasury $20,000 instead of $10,000, ought to remember that the other day, in the face of a unanimous report from the Committee on Elections, he stood up and voted with five or six others to put Mr. Boynton into Mr. LORING'S seat with no case, with no law, with no authority. Yet he challenges the integrity of this side of the House because we follow the most distinguished lawyer of the other side upon the Elections Committee in concurring in the rejection of this alleged vote in Merry Hill.

Mr. JONES. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. I cannot be interrupted now.

Mr. JONES. Will not the gentleman yield for a correction?

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. I decline to be interrupted.

Mr. JONES. I was not in the House when the vote to which the gentleman refers was taken. But if I had been here I would have voted that way.

Mr. MANNING. It is a farce, then, to talk about "correcting" the gentleman.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. Now, why do the gentlemen of the minority of the committee when they come to make their report submit this point without one word as to the law? They concede that upon the report of the majority of the committee upon the law this rejection was proper; and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] who attacks the report of the majority of the committee in regard to this precinct signed that very minority report. What does he say above his signature? I read from the report of gentlemen on the other side with regard to Merry Hill:

These votes were rejected by the State authorities and are not included in Mr. Martin's returned plurality. We leave to the consideration of the House whether these votes should now be counted for Mr. Martin or not.

The gentlemen who make the minority report do not cite an authority; they do not make one suggestion why these votes should or should not be counted. So that as to this precinct we have a unanimous report of the Committee on Elections. There is not a gentleman on this floor who has any pretension to know anything about law who will risk his reputation by maintaining that the conclusion arrived at by the majority report was not law, was not equity, was not justice. The foundation of civil institutions as supported by the integrity of the ballot-box cannot be maintained unless the principle upon which this report of the Committee on Elections in this regard is based shall be sustained.

What is the right of suffrage? It is not a natural, inalienable right. It is a right obtained under the law. It is a political right; and it is fixed and ascertained by law. When not exercised under the law it is a nullity. What the constitution and statute law of North Carolina, a sovereign State, declare to be null, and void, and dead, cannot be regarded by this House in deciding this case. These alleged ballots which were not counted, and which gentlemen say should be counted, were no more ballots in the legal sense of the word than the unused tickets which were strewn about the streets and around the polls after the election had closed; and they had no more right to be counted.

But the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] charged in this case that the contestant or his friends were guilty of bad faith in this matter at Merry Hill. Let me say in reply to that, that Judge FIELD, on the other side of this House, concedes and declares that the utmost good faith was practiced by Mr. Yeates, the contestant in this case, and by the election officers, and by the registrar of the election, a democrat. Judge FIELD says in his argument, "the conduct of the people, the conduct of the election officers, has been honest, fair, and in every respect commendable." And he managed the case and prepared the report of the minority of the Committee on Elections. It is in bad taste, therefore, for the gentleman to attack the bona fides of Mr. Yeates in this case and of the election officers. Mr. Freeman, the democratic registrar at Merry Hill, when he saw this kind of tickets, went out and showed them to democratic and republican voters and said if that kind of ticket was voted it would not be counted. He was a democratic officer and he did so before a single vote was polled. Instead of mala fides, there was the utmost good faith on the part of the election officers as shown by the testimony and as stated by Judge FIELD in this case.

I am informed, Mr. Speaker, that the time allowed to me is nearly exhausted, and therefore I must come hastily to the last precinct in this contest. It is alleged by the contestee that at Goose Nest precinct about 120 votes which were not polled ought to be counted for him. The committee hold, first, that under the law the board of election officers in that precinct properly rejected those votes. They hold, secondly, that even if these voters were conceded to have been legal voters, there is not a scintilla of reliable testimony in this case upon which you could predicate any just judgment as to how these men would have voted. Therefore on these two grounds the Committee on Elections believed they were fully justified in maintaining the decision arrived at by the election board at Goose Nest precinct.

My time will not allow me to do more than make a brief statement of the facts and the provisions of the election law of North Carolina as applicable to this precinct. On the 5th of August, 1878, Goose Nest precinct and Hamilton precinct were all one, called Hamilton precinct. On that day the board of justices of the county under the law divided Hamilton into two precincts, Goose Nest and Hamilton. At the same time they made an order appointing a registrar for Goose Nest precinct, and directed him to transfer all the voters who resided in Goose Nest precinct from the Hamilton registration to the Goose Nest registration.

It is conceded that in pursuance of this direction this transfer was made, and that there was a legal registration of every vote in Goose Nest precinct so far as it could be legal under that order of the board of justices of the county. It is also shown by the evidence that the registrar of Goose Nest precinct in pursuance of law gave thirty days' notice to every voter in that precinct to perfect his registration or to object to improper registration.

The law further provides that on the Saturday before the election the judges of election shall meet and give a chance to every voter to perfect his registration, still further and finally, or object to improper registration. On Monday before the election there was a large public meeting in Goose Nest of democrats as well as republicans. The board of election officers and registrars met on Monday instead of Saturday. On that day, at the suggestion of gentlemen who understood the law, that board—two democrats and two republicans and the registrar—unanimously agreed that in order that these persons whose names were registered there could vote they would have to have a certificate from the registrar at Hamilton showing that their names had been erased at that precinct. That decision was concurred in by the republicans as well as the democrats. And no man in that community except the contestee has been heard to complain of that decision from that hour to this. The notice was given to all alike on that afternoon, and that night a large number obtained certificates of erasure of their name from the registration at Hamilton. On the next day all voters who had been properly erased from the registration list at Hamilton were permitted to vote at Goose Nest, and those whose names were on the registration list at both places were objected to and were not allowed to vote. Why? Because the law of North Carolina provides, (1) clearly and distinctly who are legal voters, (2) how they shall prove their right to vote, and (3) where they shall vote. One of the principal objects aimed at by the law is to prevent any man from voting at any other place than his legal residence and from voting at more than that one place. Therefore, every vote cast at Goose Nest on the 5th of November, 1878, at this election was a legal vote concededly. The one hundred and twenty persons who, it is alleged, would have voted for the contestee at Goose Nest were not legal voters, for the plain and palpable reason that they could have also voted at Hamilton. If, therefore, they could have voted at Goose Nest first and afterward at Hamilton, it would have been a grave infraction of the letter and the spirit of the law in one of its most essential particulars.

Now, then, we contend, first, that these votes were illegal and were properly rejected, but if you concede that there is doubt about that position and say that they ought to have been allowed to vote, then we reply that they did not vote, and to-day this committee and this House is asked to count them without any reliable testimony which would weigh a feather before a court or a jury as to how they would have voted.

It is alleged that 154 men came up and offered to vote, yet not one of that 154 is called to show how he intended to vote or would have voted.

Instead of this plain, legal way of showing how these men would have voted, a witness is called who is a non-resident of the precinct. One William Asa Johnson, who is a relative of Mr. Martin, came down there to stand at the polls, like Martin himself, who went to Hamilton. This Johnson says that during the day he took down the names of 154 men who he swears came up with tickets and who would have voted for Martin, the contestee. The names of these persons, he says, were on the registration list at Goose Nest, and they were not received, but all were rejected for the reason that they were also on the Hamilton registration and had no certificate showing that they had been erased therefrom. He swears he took the names down at the time—154 names of men as they were called out by the registrar—but unfortunately he has not even the original list, and he gives us what he calls a certified copy. But we call the registrars of Goose Nest and Hamilton precincts as witnesses. The registrar of Goose Nest precinct swears that 13 of these names which Johnson swears he took down were not there at all, and could not therefore have been called out, and that Johnson simply falsified when he says they were names that were called out from that registration list. The registrar of Hamilton precinct swears that 21 of these names given by Johnson were on the registration lists at Hamilton; therefore could not have been at the Goose Nest precinct. What this man Johnson swears to is therefore a palpable fabrication and falsehood, and with that falsehood before you they want your approval of his statement of the fact, which is material to the case, that 154 men would have voted for the contestee but did not do so under the circumstances named, when in point of fact the contestee could have found every man and have obtained their testimony had he so desired.

This witness Johnson is also contradicted by other witnesses, particularly by Lamb, who was the register of deeds at Hamilton, and by Carraway and Leavitt, who were called and testified in the case.

For the reasons, therefore, that these alleged voters were not legal voters, and also because it was not shown how they would have voted, the majority of the committee unhesitatingly refused to reverse the action of the election board at Goose Nest, which was a full board, legally sworn, and containing an equal number of both political parties, and above all else clearly shown to have acted with regularity and in conformity to law and with the utmost good faith.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. STEVENSON in the chair.) The time allowed for the discussion of this case has expired.

The Clerk will now report the pending resolution and the substitute of the minority of the committee therefor.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Joseph J. Martin was not elected, and is not entitled to a seat in this House as a member of the Forty-sixth Congress, from the first congressional district of North Carolina.

Resolved, That Jesse J. Yeates was elected, and is entitled to a seat in this House as a member of the Forty-sixth Congress, from the first congressional district of North Carolina.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will now report the substitute proposed by the minority of the Committee on Elections.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Joseph J. Martin, the sitting member, is entitled to his seat in this House as a Representative in the Forty-sixth Congress from the first congressional district of North Carolina.

Resolved, That Jesse J. Yeates is not entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative in the Forty-sixth Congress from the first congressional district of North Carolina.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that the vote will be taken first upon the minority resolutions offered as a substitute for the report of the majority of the committee.

Mr. FIELD. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Let the resolutions be again reported.

Mr. MANNING. Will the chairman state exactly the question?

Mr. KEIFER. The vote is taken on the first of the resolutions submitted by the minority.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The vote will be first taken upon the substitute offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts for the report of the majority of the committee.

Mr. KEIFER. That is the first resolution of the minority report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The substitute embraces two resolutions.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. They form but one report after all, and the question will be taken upon both at the same time.

Mr. SPRINGER. There are only two questions presented here, whether the sitting member or the contestant is entitled to the seat. Those who vote for the resolutions submitted by the minority of the committee vote for the sitting member to retain his seat. Those who vote against them vote that the contestant is entitled to his seat.

Mr. KEIFER. That is my understanding of the question as stated by the gentleman from Illinois.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The resolution submitted by the minority of the committee will be again reported.

The resolutions were again read.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 110, nays 117, not voting 65; as follows:

Mr. SCOVILLE with Mr. CROWLEY, on political questions for the legislative days of the 28th, 29th, and 31st January, and February 1 and 2.

Mr. SMITH, of New Jersey, with Mr. HARMER, until further notice.

Mr. ARMFIELD with Mr. STARIN, until Monday, Mr. ARMFIELD reserving the right to vote to make a quorum.

Mr. DIBRELL. My colleague from Tennessee, Mr. WHITTHORNE, is confined to his room by serious illness.

Mr. HUNTON. My colleagues, Mr. JOHNSTON and Mr. CABELL, are confined to their rooms by sickness.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

Mr. SPEER moved to reconsider the vote by which the substitute was not agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 1935) to confirm to the city of Chicago the title to certain public grounds, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

CONTESTED ELECTION—YEATES VS. MARTIN.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. STEVENSON.) The question now recurs on the resolution offered by the majority of the committee.

Mr. SPEER. Let it be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Joseph J. Martin was not elected, and is not entitled to a seat in this House as a member of the Forty-sixth Congress, from the first congressional district of North Carolina.

Resolved, That Jesse J. Yeates was elected, and is entitled to a seat in this House as a member of the Forty-sixth Congress, from the first congressional district of North Carolina.

Mr. CONGER. I ask for a division of the question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In what respect does the gentleman desire a division?

Mr. CONGER. I propose to divide the subject by having a vote on each resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the first resolution.

Mr. CONGER. I understand also a division was asked on the resolutions of the minority.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands not.

Mr. KEIFER. Unquestionably, I asked that the question be divided, and I voted under that impression.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Let the resolution be reported which is now to be voted on.

Mr. KEIFER. Let me ask the Chair as a parliamentary question whether in the vote just taken we did not vote simply on the first resolution of the minority?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The vote was taken on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. FIELD.]

Mr. KEIFER. Which was the first of the two resolutions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The substitute was offered as one resolution, as the Chair understood.

Mr. MANNING. I made the inquiry, and it was distinctly stated by the Chair that that was the case.

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] made the statement—which I concurred in, and we then proceeded to vote—that we were voting as usual on a single proposition.

Mr. MANNING. I made the inquiry, and the Chair answered that the vote was on both resolutions.

Mr. KEIFER. I did not hear the gentleman make that inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The understanding of the Chair was that the vote was taken on the substitute.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. And it was so stated by the Chair.

Mr. KEIFER. Which was the first resolution of the minority as a substitute for the first resolution of the majority.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair did not so understand it.

Mr. SPRINGER. There were two questions before the House: one was whether the sitting member was entitled to a seat, which was embraced in the vote just taken, and the other whether the contestant was entitled to the seat.

Mr. SPEER. I call for the regular order.

Mr. KEIFER. That is what we are trying to find out.

Mr. SPEER. This talk is not the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair desires to state that it is usual in cases of this sort to vote upon the minority proposition as an entire proposition when it is offered as a substitute for the proposition of the majority of the report.

Mr. KEIFER. My understanding is just the reverse.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Where a demand is made for a division of the question, that is ordered where the question is divisible. But the Chair did not understand that such division was insisted upon in this case by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. KEIFER.]

Mr. KEIFER. The notes of the Reporter will show exactly that thing; that after the statement was made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] I said that I understood it as he did; and that we would take the vote upon one of the propositions of the minority report.

Mr. REAGAN. When the question was raised the Chair caused the entire substitute offered by the minority to be read, and the House voted upon the understanding that the whole substitute was before the House to be voted on.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has no difficulty in recalling what was said at the time. If the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] desires that the minutes of the Reporter be referred to——

Mr. KEIFER. Allow me to make the suggestion that we now take a vote on the first resolution reported by the majority of the committee.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Let the Clerk report the first resolution of the majority.

Mr. KEIFER. That is right; there are two resolutions.

The Clerk read the first resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That Joseph J. Martin was not elected, and is not entitled to a seat in this House as a member of the Forty-sixth Congress, from the first congressional district of North Carolina.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Now, I make the point of order, and submit it to the Chair for decision, that that is the very question upon which this House has just voted; or rather the converse of the proposition upon which the yeas and nays have just been called is found in the first resolution of the majority report. That converse proposition was submitted by the minority and voted upon and rejected by the House and is not now before this House to be voted on.

Mr. KEIFER. If gentlemen on the other side will agree to that proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACKBURN,] we will gladly accept it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. We will do it.

Mr. KEIFER. Very well; let it be understood, and we will never vote on this resolution.

Mr. BLACKBURN. We have voted on the converse of this proposition and voted it down.

Mr. KEIFER. Very well; now let your side agree to what you say.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Which voting down was an affirmation of the resolution reported by the majority.

Mr. KEIFER. I want to take the gentleman at his word.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I trust the gentleman will do so and stand by it.

Mr. KEIFER. I do, and I agree that everybody on this side of the House will stand by it forever.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Then it is agreed that we have voted upon the converse of the proposition stated in the first resolution of the majority of the committee, and have voted it down.

Mr. KEIFER. Do not make any argument about it; but let your point of order be sustained.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks that the vote now recurs upon the resolutions reported by the majority of the Committee on Elections; that is what is now properly before the House to be voted upon. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] asks for a division, and therefore the first vote will be upon the first resolution reported by the majority of the committee.

Mr. KEIFER. Then I understand the Speaker to overrule the point of order of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Understand what?

Mr. KEIFER. I understand the Speaker to overrule your point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has stated what he thought to be the parliamentary usage in such cases.

Mr. CALKINS. Let us have the ruling of the Chair upon the point of order made by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACKBURN.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has already ruled upon the question.

Mr. BLACKBURN. What is the ruling of the Chair?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair rules that the resolutions reported by the majority of the Committee on Elections are now before the House to be voted upon, and that the first resolution so reported by the majority of the committee will be first voted on.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Does the Chair rule that the resolution just reported by the Clerk, the first resolution of the majority of the committee, has not been determined by a vote of the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair rules that, the substitute offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FIELD] having been voted down, the vote now recurs upon the original proposition reported by the majority of the Committee on Elections.

Mr. BLACKBURN. As a whole or in division?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The substitute was rejected as a whole; and now the vote recurs upon the original proposition reported by the majority of the Committee on Elections.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Are we to vote upon the first resolution by itself?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] that the first vote will be upon the resolution which has just been reported by the Clerk; the first of the two resolutions reported by the majority of the Committee on Elections.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Then upon that we are to have the same vote we had before.

Mr. KEIFER. Let it be distinctly understood that we are now to vote on the first resolution reported by the majority of the Committee on Elections.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is the vote to be now taken.

Mr. KEIFER. And I call for the yeas and nays on that vote.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 117, nays 106, not voting 69; as follows:

YEAS—117.

So the resolution was adopted.

The following pair was announced:

Mr. MONEY with Mr. JOYCE, for the remainder of the day.

Mr. SPEER moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. As the decision of the Chair upon the point on which he was called to rule a few moments ago appears to have been called in question by some gentlemen, he desires to incorporate in the proceedings the action of the House and the decision of the Speaker upon a similar case which arose in the Forty-fifth Congress.

MARCH 27, 1878.

Mr. SPRINGER called up, and the House proceeded to the consideration of, the report of the Committee on Elections on the contested-election case of Dean vs. Field, from the third congressional district of the State of Massachusetts; the pending question being on the adoption of the following resolutions accompanying the said report, namely:

"Resolved, That Walbridge A. Field is not entitled to a seat in this House as the Representative from the third congressional district of the State of Massachusetts.

"Resolved, That Benjamin Dean is entitled to a seat in this House as the Representative from the third congressional district of the State of Massachusetts."

Pending which,

After debate,

Mr. SPRINGER demanded the previous question; which was seconded and the main question ordered;

When,

Mr. HISCOCK, by unanimous consent on behalf of the minority of the Committee of Elections, submitted the following resolutions as an amendment in the nature of a substitute, namely:

"Resolved, That Walbridge A. Field is entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative in the Forty-fifth Congress from the third district of Massachusetts.

"Resolved That Benjamin Dean is not entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative in the Forty-fifth Congress from the third congressional district of Massachusetts."

And the question being put, namely:

Will the House agree to the said amendment?

It was decided in the negative—yeas 120, nays 120, not voting 52.

* * * * * * * *

The Speaker thereupon voted in the negative and the division being equal namely, yeas 120, nays 120, the amendment was rejected.

The question then recurring on the resolutions reported from the Committee on Elections;

Pending which,

On motion of Mr. CONGER, (at five o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

MARCH 28, 1878.

The regular order being demanded, the Speaker announced as the regular order of business the report of the Committee of Elections on the contested-election case of Dean vs. Field, from the third congressional district of Massachusetts, the pending question being on the adoption of the following resolutions accompanying the said report, namely:

"Resolved, That Walbridge A. Field is not entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative from the third congressional district of the State of Massachusetts.

"Resolved, That Benjamin Dean is entitled to a seat in this House as the Representative from the third congressional district of the State of Massachusetts."

Pending which,

Mr. SPRINGER (at twelve o'clock and seventeen minutes p. m.) moved that the House adjourn,

And the question being put,

It was decided in the negative—yeas 4, nays 232, not voting 55.

* * * * * * * *

The question then recurring on the adoption of the said resolutions,

And being put, namely:

Will the House agree to the same?

It was decided in the affirmative—yeas 124, nays 123, not voting 45.

* * * * * * * *

So the said resolutions were adopted.

Mr. SPRINGER moved to reconsider the vote last taken, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

The question then recurred on the second resolution reported by the majority of the Committee on Elections; which was read, as follows:

Resolved, That Jesse J. Yeates was elected, and is entitled to a seat in this House as a member of the Forty-sixth Congress, from the first congressional district of North Carolina.

Mr. KEIFER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 115, nays 103, not voting 74; as follows:

YEAS—115.

So the resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. SPEER, by unanimous consent the reading of the names was dispensed with.

The following pairs were announced from the Clerk's desk:

Mr. HAMMOND, of New York, with Mr. BLISS.

Mr. GILLETTE with Mr. CHALMERS, on this case.

Mr. WARD with Mr. EVINS.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. SPEER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. SPEER. Mr. Yeates is present, and I move he be sworn in.

Mr. YEATES presented himself in front of the Speaker's desk and was duly qualified by taking the oath prescribed by section 1757 of the Revised Statutes.

INDEBTEDNESS OF FOREIGN GOVERNMENTS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, in answer to the resolution of the House of January 17, 1881, asking for statement of the character and amount of the public indebtedness of foreign governments, the rates of interest, present market value, time of payment, and discount or premiums realized upon the original negotiation of the respective bonds and securities of such governments; which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

IOWA CASES.

Mr. FIELD. I give notice that I shall call up on Monday next one of the Iowa election cases. I do not know they will give rise to debate, but members can send for the reports, as they are in print.

NAVY APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. ATKINS, by unanimous consent, the bill (H. R. No. 6969) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes, returned from the Senate with sundry amendments, was taken from the Speaker's table, ordered to be printed, and the Senate amendments numbered and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

OBELISK STEAMER.

Mr. PHILIPS. I move the House adjourn.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to make a statement. [Cries of "Regular order!"] Only a moment. The Senate has passed a joint resolution giving an American register to the steamship bought abroad and used by Lieutenant Gorringe to bring over the Egyptian obelisk. [Cries of "Regular order!"] He purchased the ship and altered it so as to answer the purpose. The Committee on Commerce have examined the Senate proposition and agree to it. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made.

ENCROACHMENTS OF WHITES ON INDIANS.

Mr. DE LA MATYR. I ask by unanimous consent to present the petition of 32,000 citizens of the United States, praying that such steps shall be taken as will prevent the encroachment of white settlers on Indian reservations, and that the treaties with the Indians be faithfully executed. [Cries of "Regular order!"] I want to print some remarks on it. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. VALENTINE. By what right does that come before this House? Let it go into the petition-box.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made to its reception.

Mr. PHILIPS's motion was agreed to; and then (at four o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, January 31, 1881.

JOHN P. JONES, a Senator from the State of Nevada, appeared in his seat to-day.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

SENATOR FROM MICHIGAN.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented the credentials of HENRY P. BALDWIN, elected by the Legislature of Michigan a Senator from that State to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of ZACHARIAH CHANDLER, for the term ending March 3, 1881.

The credentials were read; and the oaths prescribed by law having been administered to Mr. BALDWIN, he took his seat in the Senate.

CREDENTIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented the credentials of OMAR D. CONGER, elected by the Legislature of Michigan a Senator from that State for the term commencing March 4, 1881; which were read and ordered to be filed.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Commissioner of Patents, transmitting, in compliance with section 494 of the Revised Statutes, a report of the operations of the Patent Office for the year terminating December 31, 1880; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented concurrent resolutions of the Legislature of Kansas in relation to contagious diseases among cattle; which were read, as follows:

House concurrent resolution No. 4.

Resolved by the house of representatives, (the senate concurring,) That whereas the contagious pleuro-pneumonia of cattle exists in several States of the Union bordering on the Atlantic seaboard; and

Whereas it is evident that so long as unrestricted traffic in live cattle is permitted between these infected States and those not infected the live-stock interests of all sections of our country are menaced by a terrible danger; and

Whereas the state of things above indicated has resulted in the adoption of regulations by the British Government which seriously interfere with our export trade in cattle with that country, thereby entailing great damage to all cattle raisers and feeders in the United States: Therefore,

Resolved, That it is the imperative duty of Congress to enact such a law as shall effectually prevent the spread of this disease into States not already infected, and which shall result in its entire extermination at the earliest practicable date.

Resolved, That as an important preliminary step we heartily second the recommendation made by Judge Jones, of Ohio, to the President of the United States for the appointment of one or more veterinary inspectors, who shall definitely ascertain and designate the infected regions.

Resolved, That we recognize the bill introduced into the House of Representatives at its last session by General KEIFER, of Ohio, as embodying the essential features necessary to an intelligent and efficient supervision of contagious and infectious diseases of live stock generally on the part of the Federal Government, and that we heartily recommend its passage, with an additional provision which shall clothe the commission with authority to prescribe rules and regulations under which the live stock of any infected State, Territory, or district may be transported or taken therefrom, and under which live stock may be transported through such infected State, district, or Territory, or in their discretion to prohibit absolutely the transportation of live stock from or through such infected district when in their opinion the same shall be essential to the general safety.

Resolved, That the secretary of State be, and is hereby, directed to transmit to the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to the Senators and Members of Congress of the State of Kansas, copies of the foregoing preamble and resolutions, and request that the same be submitted to the Congress of the United States, and our Senators and Members of Congress be requested to secure the legislation suggested.

State of Kansas, office of secretary of State, ss:

I, James Smith, secretary of State of the State of Kansas, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of the original resolution on file in my office.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto subscribed my name and affixed my official seal. Done at Topeka this 27th day of January, A. D. 1881.

[SEAL.] JAMES SMITH,
Secretary of State.

The resolutions were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PLUMB presented the memorial of F. F. Osborn and several others, citizens of Bennington, Ottawa County, Kansas, and the memorial of J. C. Dale and several others, citizens of Bennington, Ottawa County, Kansas, remonstrating against the passage of the bill (S. No. 496) providing for the examination and adjudication of pension claims and the amendments thereto; which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented additional papers to accompany the bill (S. No. 1528) granting an increase of pension to Allen Buckner; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. RANDOLPH presented the petition of the Board of Trade of the city of Paterson, New Jersey, praying for the passage of the Reagan bill to regulate interstate commerce; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. KERNAN presented resolutions of the Legislature of New York, in favor of the enactment by Congress during the present session of such a law as shall effectually prevent the spread of contagious diseases among cattle; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. FARLEY presented the memorial of the mayor and common council of the city of Eureka, Humboldt County, California, praying for an appropriation for the improvement of the harbor of Humboldt Bay in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BOOTH presented the petition of the First Battalion of Mountaineers (California) Volunteers, praying that the benefits of the bounty act of July 28, 1866, be extended to them; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. McDONALD presented the petition of Mrs. O. M. Hechtman and 6 others, praying for an investigation into the disposition of certain lands in the State of Colorado claimed to be mineral lands; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. LOGAN presented the memorial of J. M. Vanderhoof and several others, citizens of Darien, Wisconsin, the memorial of Abner Van Dyke and several others, citizens of Delavan, Wisconsin, and the memorial of J. C. Russel and several others, citizens of Altamont, Illinois, all surviving soldiers of the war for the Union, remonstrating against the passage of the bill (S. No. 496) providing for the examination and adjudication of pension claims; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CALL presented the memorial of George Causey and several others, citizens of Florida, protesting against the passage of the bill (S. No. 496) providing for the examination and adjudication of pension claims; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WHYTE presented the petition of Ross Campbell & Co. and other firms, of Baltimore, Maryland, praying for the early enactment of a national bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. INGALLS. I present two remonstrances of late soldiers of the war of the rebellion, residing in Kansas, against the passage of Senate bill No. 496. These remonstrances emanate from the pension and claim agents of this city, and I am satisfied do not in any sense represent the convictions of the soldiers of that State. I move that they lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McMILLAN presented the petition of John Jones, of Saint Paul, Minnesota, late ordnance-sergeant United States Army, and captain of the Third Minnesota Battery, asking that the President of the United States may be authorized to place him on the retired list, with rank and pay or otherwise; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented the memorial of Emory Dibble and several others, citizens of Dundas, Minnesota, remonstrating against the passage of the bill (S. No. 496) providing for the examination and adjudication of pension claims; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. VOORHEES. I present the petition of a colored man named Sampson Goliah, a citizen of Indianapolis, and inasmuch as it is accompanied by a cordial recommendation signed by the governor of the State, the lieutenant-governor, the speaker of the house of representatives, the mayor of the city of Indianapolis, and other officials there, I ask the indulgence of the Senate to have it read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection, and the paper will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

To the honorable members of the Senate and
House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States:

Your petitioner, Sampson Goliah, now a citizen of Marion County, in the State of Indiana, and formerly a soldier of Company A, Fifty-fifth Regiment of Massachusetts Volunteers, (colored troops,) war of 1861, would represent that during his term of service a charge of mutiny was preferred against him, and he was hurriedly tried by a court-martial and sentenced to imprisonment in Fort Clinch, State of Florida, at hard labor. That, being ignorant as to the charges or proceedings, he made no defense and had no assistance.

At the muster-out of his regiment he was dishonorably discharged without pay, bounty, or allowances. He made an application in due form to the Adjutant-General of the Army of the United States for a review of the finding and change of the record, and placed all his proofs on file, but was informed that his application came too late, and that he must seek his relief by resolution of Congress. He therefore asks that the proofs he has on file may be examined by the proper committee and that the finding of the court-martial be set aside and that his disabilities be removed, the rolls and records amended, as he believes in justice should be done.

Respectfully submitted for your action. I had faithfully served as a soldier of my company and regiment for eighteen months prior to this charge and trial, and had during that time never received one dollar on my pay or bounty. I respectfully refer to the depositions and other proofs on file in the office of the Adjutant-General United States Army at Washington City, and pray that attention will be given to the application and that justice may be done in your decision.

SAMPSON GOLIAH.

Mr. VOORHEES presented a statement of the traffic on the Wabash River between Covington and Merom, Indiana, together with a letter on that subject from H. Hulman, of Terre Haute, Indiana, to accompany the bill (S. No. 2110) appropriating $75,000 for the improvement of the Wabash River; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BALDWIN presented the memorial of Charles Root & Co. and several other firms of Detroit, Michigan, remonstrating against the passage of the proposed bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1763) granting a pension to Frank Kitzmiller, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. ROLLINS, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the memorial of the Catholic clergy of the District of Columbia asking that certain taxes assessed upon parsonages in the District be remitted, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 2078) to remit certain taxes, assessments, and penalties upon parsonage property in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

MILITARY ACADEMY.

Mr. WHYTE, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the resolution of the Senate of the 25th instant, instructing that committee to inquire into the expediency of reprinting for the use of the Senate the report of the joint commission appointed under the eighth section of the act of Congress of June 21, 1860, to examine into the organization, system of discipline, and course of instruction of the United States Military Academy at West Point, submitted December 13, 1860, reported the following concurrent resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That there be printed 1,000 copies of the report of the joint commission appointed under the eighth section of the act of Congress of June 21, 1860, to examine into the organization, system of discipline, and course of instruction of the United States Military Academy at West Point, submitted December 13, 1860.

HAYDEN'S ATLAS OF COLORADO.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to which was referred a concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives to print 3,000 copies of the Atlas of Colorado by F. V. Hayden, have instructed me to report it back with amendments and recommend its passage.

By unanimous consent, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

The first amendment of the Committee on Printing was, to insert after the word "by," in line 1, the words "the Senate and."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 1, after the word "Representatives," to insert "of the United States of America in Congress assembled."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 7, after the word "copy," to add:

And provided also, That the necessary corrections be made in the same up to date; and the sum of $10,500 is he eby appropriated therefor.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THURMAN. I should be glad to have that resolution read again, with the amendments.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Public Printer be directed to furnish 3,000 copies of the Atlas of Colorado, by F. V. Hayden: Provided, The same can be supplied in sheets in every way equal in style and quality to the edition published by order of the Department of the Interior, for a sum not exceeding $3.50 per copy: And provided also, That the necessary corrections be made in the same up to date. And the sum of $10,500 is hereby appropriated therefor; 800 copies of which shall be for the use of the Senate, 1,515 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 685 for the use of the Department of the Interior.

Mr. THURMAN. Is that resolution reported from the Committee on Printing?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is reported back with amendments putting it in the form just read.

Mr. THURMAN. If we print 500,000 copies of Hayden's Survey, there will be a demand for them, and then there will be a demand for 500,000 copies more. If I send a copy into a township in Ohio, about two-thirds of the townships write to me within ten days or two weeks to send them copies.

Mr. ANTHONY. That objection applies to the printing of any document whatever that is good for anything.

Mr. KERNAN. Allow me to make a suggestion by way of inquiry. Could there not be an amendment of the law so that where a work of this kind is printed, the ordinary number, there should be a provision by which the Interior Department should be authorized to print and sell at cost such numbers as should be asked for? The people want documents of this kind, and say they will be very happy to have them. I think the law might be amended so as to allow the Secretary of the Interior to print such works and sell them at cost.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is already provided for by general law. Any person can procure any document from the Public Printer by sending the estimated cost of it in advance of publication.

Mr. KERNAN. That is not generally so understood. I should be very glad to have it go out that the people can do so.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, there is in my judgment but one solution to this business, and that is to distribute these documents to public libraries when they attain a certain number of volumes, sufficiently large to insure their perpetuity and their proper care. Then sets of books of the same class would go to the same place. The little distribution which is put in the power of Senators and Representatives does no good to the public. The Senators or Representatives who like to pay a compliment to a person by sending him a handsome book avail themselves so far as the number at their disposal goes of the books that are authorized to be printed, and they are so distributed that in nine cases out of ten the books do not go to persons who care anything about them as readers and investigators of the particular subject to which they relate.

In the district which I represented in the other House when I left it four years ago, there were twenty-five large and valuable public libraries which are as certain as any institution of the country is certain to be preserved forever and to remain; and in those public libraries the books sent will stay, and persons will know where to go. I wish the Committee on Printing would bring in a law providing that whenever anywhere in the country a library which is open to the free use of the public has attained a certain number, say four or five thousand volumes, a copy of every document printed by public authority shall be sent gratis. It would encourage the formation of those libraries, it would be a very important promoter of the education of the people, and it would plant in every neighborhood where there is any considerable population a library which would be an educating influence to the people. I think the distribution as it is made now is an utter waste or nearly an utter waste of the expenditure which it requires.

Mr. TELLER. The distribution of these maps will not be a waste by any means. Not all those that are allowed to Senators but many of them probably will find their way into public libraries. Some of them will find their way into the hands of the people. The Senator from Ohio has expressed the general opinion of the country upon this publication. It is one of the most valuable that has ever been published. It is a mere trifle that is demanded. It seems to me the Government has published very few of these maps, and I think this resolution ought to pass. We have not as many libraries in Colorado as they have in the district represented formerly by the Senator from Massachusetts, but we have endeavored to procure a set of these maps for every library, and a large number of the school districts have been furnished with them wherever we could fix them up either by buying them or by applications to Senators and Members who do not care for them, and they have gone into that country. The demand for them comes from nearly every institution of learning in the United States. The number proposed is small; it ought to be much larger.

I hope there will be nothing tacked on to this resolution which will make it general, and thereby defeat it; but let this pass, and if there is any error in the system let us remedy it afterward.

Mr. THURMAN. I think, Mr. President, great consideration is due to the remarks made by the Senator from Massachusetts. The right places to send these things to are libraries. I have always sent mine to libraries as far as I could, but I could not always resist the importunities of some personal friend to whom I was under obligation, or some scientist or other. We had a notable instance of this in the Medical and Surgical History of the War, the most prominent publication I think the Government ever made. I sent the few copies I got to medical colleges, and I had a multitude of applications all around from medical gentlemen asking for the book, and presently Congress had a new edition of it published. Now here is a new edition of these surveys or atlases as they are called. There will be no end to this book-making by Congress unless we shall say firmly at once there shall be a stop put to it. If I am not mistaken—and if I am the chairman of the Committee on Printing will correct me—almost every valuable publication by Congress can be obtained by purchase from the Printing Office at the cost of printing and some small percentage added to that. If that is the case, what is the necessity for our making ourselves a great distributing reservoir for all manner of publications?

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, this is an old question that has been discussed in the Senate every session. The Committee on Printing have constantly endeavored to institute a system of publishing documents for sale instead of for gratuitous distribution, and have been constantly voted down by the Senate, notably in the instance of the agricultural report, where the Senate, against the report of the committee, have ordered nearly a thousand copies for every Senator. Now, this survey has been made at great expense, but a small edition of the atlas has been printed; to withhold from the public this information which has been obtained at so great expense, on account of the small cost of publication, is to build a house and then not shingle it. If we collect this information we should distribute it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I noticed the remark of the Senator from New York in regard to the right to purchase documents and the reply of the Senator from Rhode Island. As I understand the law, any person can purchase at the Government Printing Office any publications of the Government at cost and 10 per cent. added, provided he files the application there before the publication of the document. That is simply equivalent to no purchase at all, because the people are not advised of these publications and of their merit until after they are issued and are seen. I would suggest to the committee that they make some arrangement by which parties can purchase at cost these publications after they are ascertained to be valuable. In a case of this kind, let one hundred or two hundred or five hundred copies be in possession of the Department for sale alone; but simply to authorize persons to buy publications provided they file their application before they are produced and before the people know what they are worth or what they are is merely no privilege at all.

Mr. ANTHONY. The point of the Senator from Missouri is very well taken. The committee have repeatedly reported resolutions for publishing documents for sale, and have sometimes succeeded in persuading the Senate to allow five hundred or a thousand copies—never more than that, I think—and the last time it was the report of the Commissioner of Fisheries, we got through an allowance of five hundred copies for sale; that is all we could get through. I think the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri is perfectly correct. He agrees entirely with the committee, and as the committee have repeatedly reported here and been voted down by the Senate——

Mr. COCKRELL. I trust the committee will try it again, and I hope they will not be voted down.

Mr. TELLER. The Government of the United States directly has never published any of these maps. After going to this great expense no appropriation was made, and Hayden's Geological Survey, having a little money that was in hand for contingent expenses, proceeded to publish a few of these maps, so that really the Government has never directly published them; and they ought to be published.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the resolution as amended.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BURNSIDE asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2127) to aid in the protection of the public records and property against loss and damage by fire; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. KERNAN asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2128) to amend section 699 of the Revised Statutes, relating to writs of error and appeals; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. ALLISON asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2129) for the relief of certain homestead and pre-emption settlers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WALLACE asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2130) for the extension of the area of the Mint at Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, and for greater security to the same; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. McPHERSON asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2131) appropriating money to be used under the direction of the Navy Department to prosecute a search for the steamer Jeannette of the Arctic exploring expedition; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. VOORHEES asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2132) providing pensions for the survivors of the battle of Tippecanoe and for the widows of soldiers therein engaged who are dead; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. VOORHEES. If the Senate will permit me, I desire to call the attention of the Committee on Pensions to the fact that by the construction of the Pension Office the survivors of the battle of Tippecanoe are not included under the act of March 3, 1879, granting pensions to the survivors of the war of 1812. I should be glad if the committee would give attention to the bill which I have introduced. I move its reference to the committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. VOORHEES asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2133) appropriating $75,000 for the improvement of the Kankakee River from the town of Momence, in the State of Illinois, to a point near English Lake, in La Porte County, in the State of Indiana; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. VOORHEES. I present a letter to accompany that bill from Hon. Thomas J. Wood, a senator from the counties of Lake and Porter, in the Indiana Legislature, in relation to the improvement of the Kankakee River. I move its reference to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS (by request) asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2134) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate The Masonic Mutual Relief Association of the District of Columbia as amended March 3, 1875;" which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. PENDLETON asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2135) for the relief of the heirs of Edward M. Shield; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

THE COLLAMER STATUE.

Mr. MORRILL submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was read:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring.) That the thanks of this Congress be presented to the governor, and through him to the people of the State of Vermont, for the statue by Preston Powers of Jacob Collamer as an eminent American statesman; that this work of art is accepted and assigned a place in the National Statuary Hall set apart by Congress for the statues of distinguished citizens from the several States; and that a copy of this resolution, signed by the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, be transmitted to the governor of the State of Vermont.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, the number of statues, of men distinguished in the past history of our country, already placed in the National Statuary Hall by their respective States, indicates something of the priceless value which will belong to the assemblage there when all the States shall be fully represented. I am glad to be informed by several Senators of States which have not taken final action upon this subject, that they have been embarrassed most by their riches, or, by the number of names regarded as worthy of the rare distinction of being handed down to future times as the picked men of their day and generation, and that considerable additions to the hall may ere long be expected.

In making her selection of names of persons whose memory was to be perpetuated in marble, Vermont selected one from the period of the American Revolution, the historic hero, Ethan Allen, and the other from so late a date that many here may remember the person of Senator Collamer, and will hardly need details as to his services or character. The people of Vermont had confidence in his eminent ability, in the untarnished purity of his life, and they trusted him from his youth to long past "three score and ten" in the most important public posts within their gift, in all of which he acquitted himself with such distinction as to steadily exalt his reputation. At the period of his death he stood forth as the foremost citizen of the State, in ability, moral excellence, and national distinction.

Men in official life here come and go rapidly, and few are so fortunate as to earn titles to enduring fame. Present duties are too engrossing to allow much careful study of those who figured on the stage as our predecessors. Although the country may often profit by their works, only in rare instances are the names on the tombstones of the authors retouched by any devotion akin to that of Old Mortality. While this is generally true, it is gratifying to meet with men from all parts of our country whose memories do not wait to be refreshed, and whose knowledge and judgment awards to Collamer a high place among American statesmen.

His earthly career ended November 9, 1865, in his seventy-fifth year. The respect and esteem in which he was held by his brother Senators appears to have been accurately measured in their heartfelt obituary tributes. If a few words then recorded shall now be reproduced, I know they will be pardoned because of their truth and brevity.

Senator Fessenden, unequaled as a debater in the Senate, and ever careful in the use of language, said:

> Among the distinguished men who, during the past ten years, have occupied these seats, I regarded Senator Collamer as having no superior.

Senator Dixon did not hesitate to call him "The Nestor of the American Senate."

Senator Sumner was more elaborate but equally unstinted. He said:

> Since Henry Clay left this Chamber by the gate of death, no Senator has passed that way, crowned with the same honorable years, as Mr. Collamer; nor has any Senator passed that way whose departure created such a blank in the public councils, unless we except Mr. Douglas.

And, finally, he added:

> Call him then, if you please, the Green Mountain Socrates.

Senator Harris declared that it might be said of him as it was of John Quincy Adams:

> No excesses of a profligate youth, no vices of middle life, have shattered and hurried to a premature dissolution the body in which his incorruptible spirit resided.

Such was the character, drawn by those who knew him best, of Jacob Collamer. The voices then heard of these four distinguished Senators are now silent, all having soon joined the company of the friend they so tenderly portrayed; but we still seem to hear the lingering echo of words from those who once commanded so much respect of the country, and so much the esteem of their associates.

Authority was first given by the Vermont Legislature to employ Hiram Powers to furnish the Collamer statue; but this highly gifted artist having died soon after, the same authority was then granted to employ his son, Preston Powers, who in portrait statuary has achieved an excellent reputation, and by many is held to be not inferior in that line even to his father. The statue presented has been wrought out of a remarkably fine specimen of Carrara marble, and I do not doubt that the statue itself will be accepted, not only as a spirited and accurate likeness, but as a creditable work of art. Modern costume is the terror of sculptors; but, in this case, it appears to have been handled with as much skill as is ever obtainable, and the statue as a whole may be said to be both dignified and pleasing. No one who ever saw Mr. Collamer at the bar, on the bench, or in the Senate, can fail to recognize its life-like truthfulness.

This statue is presented by the State of Vermont, of a citizen she has honored and by whom she has been honored in return, whose character for solidity and purity of texture is happily typified in the marble representation, and it is presented with faith that it may be received as a worthy contribution to stand among the eminent representatives of the great sisterhood of States which are to ultimately grace Statuary Hall.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, I rise with pleasure to second this resolution. I believe that my honored friend, the senior Senator from Maine, and myself are the only present members of this body who served with Mr. Collamer; but his character and his services are among the cherished traditions of the Senate. He brought to it a sound judgment, high ability, ripe experience in various departments of public life, and a well-earned reputation for stainless integrity. He at once assumed a commanding postion, and took a leading part in its deliberations; and when I entered this Chamber, he was, as the late Senator from Connecticut well said, the Nestor of the Senate. There was no one here whose counsels carried greater weight, whose advice was received with greater respect. Mr. Collamer was cast in the antique mould of truth and manliness. He was a type of the region from which he sprung, and of the constituency which he represented; wise, thoughtful, conscientious, he reached his conclusions, after full deliberation and he adhered to them with the tenacity of honest conviction. A quaint humor enlivened the gravity of his discourse; and a fund of apposite anecdote illustrated and enforced the positions that he took. But his character has been so well portrayed by one of those who have succeeded to his honors, that I will not mar the picture by any touches of my own.

I have often thought that Vermont, the eldest of the later sisterhood of the States, to the independence of which she contributed her full share, and to whose wars she sent the renowned hero whose statue already adorns the old Hall of the Representatives, was one of the most fortunate of free commonwealths. Independent and self-sustaining, in her resources as in her character, she is capable of raising her own food, of manufacturing her own clothing, of supplying, from her own soil and her own industrial arts, the essentials and many of the superfluities of civilized life. Education is universal, throughout the State. Nowhere is labor held in higher esteem. Wealth is distributed with remarkable equality, and honest toil has banished poverty from her pleasant borders. She has uniformly been represented in this and in the other branch of Congress by men, the natural outgrowth of such conditions and of such institutions. She has contributed to the public councils wise statesmanship, sound law, practical good sense, and elevated patriotism. I could not enumerate those of her sons who have distinguished themselves in these Halls, without violating good taste, by naming some who still survive. She has sent more brilliant men, men of more fervid eloquence, of more impassioned utterance to represent her, than Collamer; but none wiser, none purer, none who has rendered better service to herself and to the country. She does well to send his statue to the Capitol, an enduring memorial of his worth and of her generous and grateful appreciation.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I feel moved to say a very few words on this occasion, by the fact that many years ago, for a brief period, I knew Mr. Collamer and enjoyed the pleasure of an intimate friendship with him. When I entered the House of Representatives in the Twenty-ninth Congress he was already a member of that body. I learned soon to admire him for his remarkable penetration of intellect, his extraordinary good common sense, and his uniform courtesy to all his fellow-members, and I feel it somewhat a duty as a member of that Congress to pay a few words of tribute to his memory.

Of all who were members of that Congress in both Houses, there are but two of us who remain, the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] and myself. A vast majority of those who served in that Congress have passed away from earth. I say I feel it a duty to bear my testimony to the worth of the members of that Congress whom I knew and whom I highly esteemed, as I did Mr. Collamer.

Mr. President, it has been said here that he was not a very brilliant man; but judgment is the highest faculty of the human intellect, and he would be a bold man who should assert that either House of Congress has ever held a member whose judgment was better than that of Jacob Collamer. Courtesy and politeness are also great qualities, which do much to remove the asperities of debate and the controversies of party; and although Mr. Collamer was a man who could give hard blows as well as take them, it was his uniform practice, while I knew him, never to be aggressive, certainly never personally aggressive upon any one, and I never knew any one to be so toward him.

Mr. President, these remarks of mine are wholly unprepared. I did not know until a few minutes ago that this resolution would be presented to-day, but I could not forego the occasion to say this much in respect to a friend whom I dearly esteemed, and whom I more than esteemed, whom I greatly admired.

Vermont, sir, though a small State, has produced many great men, and it may be doubtful whether when her history shall come to be written a century hence there will be one name on her long roll of statesmen more deserving of admiration than that of Jacob Collamer.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What my friend and colleague and other Senators have said leaves little for me to add respecting the individual character of the distinguished citizen of Vermont whose statue she this day unveils in the Capitol and delivers to Congress in perpetual trust, not only as a memorial of her own career, but as a contribution to that history which has, among all nations, been preserved by temples and monuments as well as by writings and books. But I may, perhaps, say, without wearisome repetition, that the selection of Mr. Collamer for the subject of a statue to be placed in one of the old legislative Halls of the Capitol was, in my judgment, eminently a wise one, for he was a fair type of that social condition and civilized progress which, on this continent, began on the dark December day when the Mayflower landed her band of weary but stout-hearted pilgrims who could "not dwell by Haarlem Mere, nor build along the Zuyder Zee" on the dreary coast of Massachusetts Bay, and which have spread over New England like the cool and refreshing winds from its seas—and have followed the morning sunshine westward over wilderness, and lake, and mountain chain, building up prosperous and well-ordered States, till they have reached the utmost boundary of the Republic, and have built temples dedicated to liberty, justice, and education on the shores of the tranquil ocean. His origin was humble; he fought the battle of life with no factitious advantage either of family, or wealth, or extraordinary gifts of rhetoric, or even those accidents of opportunity which have made so many men great. His character was self-reverent, self-reliant, self-controlling, persistent. These were the qualities that made his twenty-one years at the bar a period of steadily increasing success, his eight years in the supreme court of his State a valuable contribution to jurisprudence, and his ten years and upward in this body—more than one-half of which was during the most momentous and dangerous experiences in our history,—a daily, and generally victorious struggle for comprehensive and conservative legislation, and for bold yet prudent administration.

His statue will, I think, stand, pars inter pares, with those of the illustrious personages whom other States have selected as worthy to form part of that great group which is, in this chief seat of republican government and the rights of man, to recall to future generations something of the form and individuality of the founders and supporters of free institutions among us. There may they stand, in their silent yet speaking majesty, for a hundred centuries.

The idea of creating and preserving such monuments is a noble and almost instinctive one. The earliest records of that dim and far-off Egyptian history when Memnon sang to the morning, have come down to us by these means in obelisk and propylon, though, alas! many of her sacred monuments no longer watch the endless flow of the fruitful Nile, "where o'er the sand of morning land the camel bears the spice," but wrested from their long repose, now deck, in distant countries and in smoky cities, the triumphs of the age of steam.

The earliest legend of the Romans tells us how when Romulus had been carried up to heaven in the chariot of Mars, the people built a temple to him and worshiped him by the name of the god Quirinus; and who can forget that for the patriotic and heroic service of Horatius Cocles the Romans set his statue in the Comitium, and gave him as much land as he could run the plow round in a whole day?

The statue of Hofer, at once rebel and patriot, still stands in the ancient city of Innspruck; that of William Tell looks out over the transparent waters of the Lake of the Four Cantons, upon the crags and peaks of Switzerland, and holds to them "the hands they first beheld, to show they still are free," while Westminster Abbey contains a long array of statues, monuments, and other memorials of the worthies who have made the name of Great Britain great among the nations of the earth.

So may the Capitol of our land continue to receive and preserve from year to year, and from age to age, the pictures and statues of its citizens most illustrious for their fidelity and service to that Government which is "of the people and for the people," not only as memorials and landmarks of history, but as incentives and inspirations to worthy aims and the toil of patient courage, for all beholders.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was adopted unanimously.

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 144) authorizing the loan of certain flags and bunting to the committee on inaugural ceremonies.

KILLING OF BIG SNAKE.

Mr. DAWES. A few days since I gave notice that I would at this time ask the Senate to take up for reference a letter, addressed to the Senate by the Secretary of the Interior, in reference to the killing of Big Snake, now on the table.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator, I understand, desires to submit some remarks on that question.

Mr. DAWES. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. GARLAND in the chair.) Does the Senator from Massachusetts desire that the letter be read in full?

Mr. DAWES. I ask that the letter be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, January 5, 1881.

SIR: On the 12th of March last, Senate resolution calling for "all the information in the Department concerning the alleged killing by soldiers, in the office of the agent of the Poncas, in the Indian Territory, of Big Snake, a chief man of the Poncas, and what has been the action of the Department, if any, in reference to the matter," passed on the preceding day, was received by this Department, and on the same day (12th) it was referred to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs with special directions for report.

A reference to the inclosed letter from the Indian Office, dated the 23d ultimo, will show that the report requested was made by that office in due time, but failed to reach this Department. This is explained by Mr. Brooks, late chief clerk of the Indian Office, who says that either he or Commissioner Trowbridge delivered the report in person to the Senate "Committee for the investigation of the condition, &c., of the Poncas."

Recently my attention was drawn to the circumstances that the report had not reached me, and I at once directed that a copy of the same be made, which I beg leave herewith to present, together with the above explanation of the accidental delay, which I very much regret.

I am, sir, very respectfully,

C. SCHURZ, Secretary.

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, on the 11th day of March, 1880, the Senate addressed to the Secretary of the Interior a note of inquiry suggested by some papers which came into the hands of one of its committees in the course of its investigations. The resolution of inquiry was in the following words:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to communicate all information in the Department concerning the alleged killing by soldiers, in the office of the agent of the Poncas, in the Indian Territory, of Big Snake, a chief man of the Poncas, and what has been the action of the Department, if any, in respect to the same.

The answer to this inquiry was laid on our table on the 5th day of January, 1881, ten months thereafter. The Senate is informed in the letter communicating this answer that the delay was caused by inadvertence. Such inadvertence may happen in a press of business and could, of itself alone, hardly be made the subject of criticism; but the Secretary states that the answer had been already placed in the hands of the committee who instituted this inquiry, and his Commissioner of Indian Affairs not only fixes the date some nine months since, but more than intimates that the papers had been purposely lost by that committee, though they were ostensibly still seeking the information. Neither of these statements has any foundation in fact. No answer to this inquiry was ever made to the Ponca committee, but on the contrary the Indian Bureau was repeatedly reminded by members of the committee that it had not been received, and it was only after the Secretary was himself reminded of it, scarcely a month ago, that the answer reached the Senate at all. There are other minor inadvertencies in the letter of the Secretary, but they are worthy of no other mention than that felicity of phrase often sacrifices truth.

But I do not trouble the Senate with these remarks for the purpose of finding fault with the delay or with the answer offered in excuse. It is to the subject-matter itself that I desire to call the serious attention of the Senate. It relates to the violent death at the hands of Government officials of a high-spirited and brave man, who had committed no other offense than harboring a love of his own country and home, which time could not extinguish and power could not suppress. As those in whose service these officials caused this tragic death have taken no action in reference to it, nor even expressed an opinion of its character when inquired of by the Senate, but had even forgotten that the inquiry had been made, I have deemed it due to all concerned that the true character of this occurrence should be entered upon the permanent records of the country that whoever may read the history of our dealings with the weak and defenseless may have the material from which to judge those who dip their hands in innocent blood. A transaction so grave as the violent death of a fellow-man at the hands of the Government itself should not be permitted to escape its just place in history, and when those who caused it do not choose, even on request, to put it there, some volunteer must undertake it, and therefore I beg the attention of the Senate for a few moments.

When Government officials set about extorting from the Ponca Indians, at the point of the bayonet, their consent to leave the home of their fathers deeded to them by that same Government, those officials encountered the strong and uncompromising opposition of two men of the tribe. They were brothers, born leaders of men, intelligent, bold, brave, chivalric, and patriotic. They could neither be persuaded out of their homes by soft words, deceived by false ones, corrupted by promises, or moved by threats. Their influence with their fellows was, accordingly, very great, and proved a serious obstacle to the forcible deportation of the tribe in which those officials were engaged. That obstacle could not be overcome, and it was necessary, therefore, to crush it. The heavy hand of the Government was laid upon these two men, and has never been taken off. One of them has fallen in the conflict; the other is an exile; and the Government is at this moment engaged in the laudable attempt to starve into submission as brave a spirit as lives, since it has not as yet been convenient to otherwise dispose of him. The biography of the latter days of these two men is full of interest and pathos, if not of credit to the Government under which they lived. When the work of driving the Poncas out of their homes began, these two Indians told their associates that they had a country, and had bought and paid for it as other people had bought and paid for theirs, and that in a land of law and justice they could not be dispossessed of it; and their countrymen listened to them. Thereupon these two men were seized by soldiers and cast into prison, many miles away from their people, and there kept in confinement till the work of driving out the tribe at the point of the bayonet had been completed. They were then permitted to join the exiles on their forced march to the Indian Territory.

But neither banishment nor inhospitable clime, nor sickness and death on all sides and in their own households, could break or humble the proud spirits of these two heroes, or save them from the persecution their obstinacy had brought upon them. They were singled out for that watchful care which suspicion always begets in the minds of petty tyrants, and subjected to a surveillance and espionage which have no parallel in dealings with civilized men, in this country at least, and which became at last intolerable even to a savage. One of these brothers, Standing Bear, with thirty followers, enfeebled by sickness and want, discouraged and homesick, turned their faces homeward with no other guide but instinct and their feeble knowledge of the courses of the stars. They were taken in for rest by their friends, the Omahas, worn out and exhausted by long wandering over the pathless prairie and almost ready to give up in sight of "the old burial places of their fathers." But rest was not yet for them, the pursuer was on their track. Soldiers marched into the Omaha reservation with the Stars and Stripes of a free country at their head, and dragged these helpless fugitives from the tents of savage hospitality and charity, and turned them back toward the forced banishment to which civilization had doomed them. A writ of habeas corpus set them free, and now stands between them and all other benevolent efforts of the Indian Bureau to subdue them, except starvation. This they still cheerfully brave for the sake of living where their fathers lived and where their children were born.

Our business at this time, however, is with the other brother, Big Snake. With him the work was quicker and more effective, and it brought sooner the rest he longed for. There was no power within him or without him which could make him content with his exile or teach him to brook the indignities which the indiscretions of his haughty spirit brought daily upon his devoted head. He sought for contentment in a visit to a friendly tribe without the permit which the Indian agent set over him as a master had refused, only to be incarcerated in a prison-house on his arrival in place of the feast of welcome prepared for him by his red brethren.

On his release from this imprisonment, this big-hearted and proud chief returned to his companions in exile not a whit humbled, but with as haughty a spirit as ever. But conscience made a coward of the Indian agent. Not capable of comprehending that his miserable life was safe in the very contempt which his pettiness had begotten, he feared bodily harm at the hands of the man he had maltreated, and appealed to the Interior Department for soldiers to arrest this noble among his race, and—I now use his words—"convey him to Fort Reno, and there confine him for the remainder of his natural life." Even this trivial pretext was subsequently shown to be groundless; but if it had been founded upon some actual danger, this was a proceeding that neither law nor decency could justify, and the occasion required only that just and mild treatment which is sure to win the confidence of even a savage. Yet because of the fears of a coward, and upon a charge which was only a pretext, and a pretext so inadequate as to be ridiculous, it was proposed to confine this child of the hills and the prairies for the rest of his natural life. Without investigation or inquiry, this atrocious request was complied with by the Interior Department, and soldiers appeared at the agency to execute the order. The cowardly agent beguiled Big Snake into his office under a promise of the payment of money due, and then ordered the soldiers, already there, to take him away. When the soldiers laid their unlawful hands upon this unsuspecting victim of another man's treachery, the Indian demanded in astonishment the cause of this attempt to arrest him. It was only after repeated demands, defying their power until he was answered, that the agent disclosed to him the dastardly purpose of this atrocity. The Indian, after a moment's silence, rose with a dignity which should have put to shame his civilized assailants, and said:

I have done no wrong. I have been injured and indignant at the wrongs inflicted upon me. But I have injured no man, and have threatened injury to no man in return.

And then, lifting both his hands above his head, he continued:

See, I am not armed. I am one and you are many; my muscle alone is all I have for defense against you and your weapons, but I will not be thus taken to prison without cause.

Then ensued a struggle to chain him, but the mighty man cast off the soldiers as if they had been so many infants. One of them was ordered to knock him down with the butt of his musket, and he received unmoved a blow which the cowardly agent said "would have brought an ox to the ground." The struggle continued with doubtful odds until a soldier, from a position prearranged for the purpose, put an end to it by a ball which pierced the brain of the victim and passed through the building into the affrighted crowd of men and women which had gathered around.

Thus ended the career of one who, had he fallen in defense of the white man's right to his home and his fireside as he fell for the red man, would have passed into history enrolled among the heroes and martyrs sacrificing their lives in a most holy cause. But this hero has not even been permitted to rest in the humble grave to which he was thus consigned. It was necessary to blacken his name in order to find justification for his assassination. Hence the charge that he was a dangerous man, and had threatened the life of the agent who had maltreated him, a charge unsupported by any reliable evidence then and now, and originating in the imagination of the agent, conscious that what he had done was calculated to provoke the revenge of an Indian. Equally groundless, too, was the insinuation thrown out afterward that Big Snake was killed because he had a knife. He had demonstrated by throwing up his hands in the outset that he was unarmed, and no weapon of any kind was found upon his lifeless body, though no one of the perpetrators of the murder had justice enough in his breast to give their victim the benefit of that fact.

These baseless insinuations were met by the positive testimony of the Indians themselves, who with one accord testified to the peaceable character of their chief. And if this is not enough, certainly no one will doubt the word of an Indian inspector testifying in their favor. Indian Inspector Pollock, who afterward visited the spot for another purpose, made a thorough investigation of this whole transaction, and declared under oath that he was not able to trace the charge of threats to any reliable source, and then characterized this violent death of a man at the hands of officials of this Government in these words: "It looked to me," he said, "to put it in plain English, like a cowardly, willful murder."

For its share in this transaction the War Department contented itself with a report upon its character directed by those who participated in the very matter they reported upon. But the Interior Department, at whose request the work was undertaken which resulted in this "willful, cowardly murder," has not even taken any notice of it. The Indian agent, to allay whose cowardly fears it was done, was not even censured for his part in it. It is true that afterward it was found that he had been inaccurate in the addition of his accounts, and for that offense he was discharged, leaving his participation in this grave crime not even reproved. Indeed the whole thing has been so in accordance with the ordinary mode of transacting Indian affairs, or the life of an Indian is counted of so little consequence, that when inquired of about it by the Senate of the United States, the Interior Department forgot for nearly a year to answer the inquiry at all, and then did not deem it worth while to express an opinion upon its character.

It may be, Mr. President, that I have magnified this event beyond any legitimate importance which may justly belong to it. I know that the victim was only an Indian, and that he is now a "dead Indian." But I confess that this has seemed to me a good deal like other murders, and I am as yet unable to disabuse my mind of a feeling that our dealings with the weak who come under our power should be characterized by a scrupulous regard to justice and humanity, more carefully meted, perhaps, to him who has no power to compel the exaction of the justice which is his due and not written in the blood of innocent men.

It has been a relief to me, however, in examining our treatment of these weak and defenseless people, to find that these methods are not American in their origin, but bear too striking a resemblance to the modes of an imperial government carried on by espionage and arbitrary power. They are methods which I believe to be unique, and which I trust will never be naturalized.

Mr. President, I hold in my hand a petition which it is perhaps not inappropriate that I should at this time present to the Senate. I have spoken of two brothers, one of them an exile in his own land, one of them assassinated by the Government itself.

You will recollect, sir, that not long since there was presented to the Senate in print, by the Interior Department, the petition of that portion of the Ponca Indians now in the Indian Territory for permission to sell out their possessions in Dakota to the Government.

The unconquered survivor of these brothers, Standing Bear, and that portion of the tribe with him in their old homes, now protest against being thus disinherited. I ask that their prayer may be read, with the certificate of its authenticity, that these exiles may know that they have been heard, and may be assured that justice will be done them by the Senate of the United States. This manly protest is in these words:

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

Whereas we hear that a portion of the Ponca Tribe, in the Indian Territory, have signed an agreement, in which they declare their willingness to sell our old reservation in Nebraska and Dakota Territory—

We, the undersigned, do most earnestly protest against the ratification of any such sale; for the land spoken of is ours as well as theirs, and they cannot dispose of it without our consent.

We hereby declare to you our purpose and desire to live upon this same land, having suffered many sorrows and privations in returning to it.

We pray you to order that we may share equally, according to our numbers, in all assistance which the Government may give the tribe, and in all payments of damages for losses by removal or by depredations of hostile tribes.

And, moreover, we request that we may be reimbursed out of the tribal funds, for our portion of the annual annuities, which have not been given us since we left the Indian Territory.

We respectfully and earnestly ask that in all actions taken by the Government affecting the Ponca tribe of Indians, or any part thereof, that our rights under all treaties between the United States and the tribe, and under the laws of the land, shall be fully respected and protected, to the end that we may enjoy our own possessions and prosper in the ways of civilization.

We ask also for a teacher, and that whatever the Government may have to give us be distributed through the agent for the Santees as is now done for the citizen Indians at Flandreau, Dakota Territory.

We, the undersigned, express in this petition the unanimous wish of that portion of the Ponca tribe at present residing on the old reservation, and numbering about one-fifth of the whole tribe.

NIOBRARA, NEBRASKA, January 12, 1881.

I now move that the letter of the Secretary of the Interior and the accompanying papers, with this petition, be referred to the select committee on that subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That will be the order, if there be no objection.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I do not wish to detain the Senate now after the time when the regular order should come before the Senate. I may, perhaps to-morrow morning, ask the indulgence of the Senate for a very brief period, to make some reply.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business is the Indian severalty bill.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire one moment. I do not wish to enter into the discussion which has been suggested to the Senate this morning by the Senator from Massachusetts, nor do I wish to make any defense to the charges he has made; but I do wish to say something in response to one suggestion of his. I do not know what he means when he refers to the conduct of the Interior Department. I wish to say for myself—and I speak only for myself—that I have had a little to do with the Committee on Indian Affairs and I have had something with the Department of the Interior. I have always been in favor of the civilization of the Indians; I have always advanced that theory, and I fought in this Chamber against the transfer of the Indians from the care of the Interior Department to another under which I thought they would be more severely treated. If the Senator refers to the conduct of the Interior Department in reference to Indians, I must say for those who have no right to speak on this floor that my judgment is that the course of the Interior Department, especially of the head of that Department, in reference to Indian affairs for the last few years, has been eminently proper; and I believe that if the theory which has been advocated by the Secretary of the Interior in reference to the Indians was agreed to and consented to by the Congress of the United States it would be beneficial to all parties.

I say this of a man with whom I have disagreed formerly on many questions, and not because of any personal relations between him and me now; and I believe further that his Department has been administered as honestly, capably, fairly, and justly as any Department of this Government; and when any attempt is made, directly or indirectly, to cast reflection upon the Secretary of the Interior for the manner in which he has attempted, at least as far as he has been able to do it, to manage justly and honestly the affairs of the Indian Department, I think the criticism is entirely unjust and without merit.

This much I desired to say in defense of a man who I believe has attempted honestly to administer the affairs of this Government so far as they pertain to the Indian Department.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator from Illinois does well in what he has said. If he had gone further and undertaken to defend the transaction to which I have called the attention of the Senate, I should have been amazed. That the Senator should have said what he has said does not surprise me, for it agrees with my own judgment——

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator will allow me to suggest that I merely said it for the reason that I thought from his remarks it might be inferred by the country at least that this was an accusation of unfaithfulness in the administration of the Interior Department. That was the reason why I said what I did say.

Mr. DAWES. Neither here nor elsewhere, neither on this occasion nor upon the discussion of the allotment bill or any other bill looking to the management of the Indians, has a single word ever fallen from my lips in disparagement of the general policy of the Indian Department, or its head, toward the Indians. On frequent occasions here, and before the public at home, I have taken occasion to commend it, with the exception of this particular transaction with regard to the Poncas; and I think it is a mystery past finding out as yet that, with so much to commend in the work of the Interior Department toward the Indians, it should be willing to go into history without a single effort on its part to remove a stain upon the record of this Government toward one of the most peaceable and honorable bands of men that ever lived under its flag. No one has charged, I have not charged, the head of this Department with the commission of these wrongs. I have complained of them to him, and before the public, and entreated him to take hold of this work himself and leave upon the records of the country, not only that he had no part or lot in this great crime, but that he disapproved of it. This very action of the Senate itself; this resolution that he forgot to answer for ten months, I implored myself the Indian Bureau to so answer that it would leave upon the records of the country the disapproval of it—that disapproval which they were free enough to give me in private. That is what I complain of; and when the answer comes, ten months after, we are coolly told that it is not deemed worth while to express an opinion upon the character of the transaction. Now, sir, so long as I can cherish a sense of justice in my breast, I will draw a line between all that which the Senator from Illinois has so justly laid before the Senate as worthy of commendation on the part of the head of the Department and this act—not his act, but his failure to hold those he sent on this errand accountable to the laws of justice and humanity for the manner in which they discharged that duty.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, I do not care to enter into this discussion either now or at any other time so far as relates to the Ponca Indians. I only desire now to say, in reference to one portion of the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts, that he fitly characterized the man who was agent at the Ponca agency at the time Big Snake was killed. If I heard him aright, he spoke of him as "the cowardly agent." I know the person who was the agent at that agency at that time. He was a man whose physical service for his country was about four years of time in the Army, and so far as personal courage was concerned, a man entirely above reproach; and while I am not going to say, because I do not know that the killing was justifiable—in fact, I am willing to assume that it was not justifiable—I think the most that can be said about it, so far as the agent is concerned, is that he, misjudging the necessity or not judging at all about the necessity of any killing, undertook a scheme or plan which, without any intention on his part, resulted in the death of the Indian.

I say this in justice to him because of the fact that circumstances that came before the Interior Department, as the Senator from Massachusetts says, in regard to his accounts, led to his retirement, and I am not willing that he shall rest under the further imputation of having acted in a cowardly manner. He did what I think he believed to be his duty, then and on all occasions; did it with personal courage, did it with fidelity, and did it with honesty.

So far as the action of his superior is concerned, either in not censuring him, or in regard to the action which preceded that event, I have nothing whatever to say. It illustrates, I think, on the whole, the necessity of doing something which shall relieve the Senate of the United States and the country from controversies of this kind hereafter; and I hope that out of this discussion will grow something that will be permanent in the way of legislation, and in the way of practice at the Department, and which shall relieve the Government from the unfortunate necessity of dealing with the Indians in the way in which these Indians were dealt with.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I merely wish to repeat what I said before, that to-morrow morning during the morning hour I shall ask the indulgence of the Senate to make some remarks which my sense of justice and of right to men who have not the chance of speaking for themselves on this floor requires should be made. I will not interfere with the regular business now.

Mr. LOGAN. I wish to be allowed a single moment further. I desire merely to say that I did not intend to be drawn into any discussion in reference to the killing of this Indian, nor do I so intend now. All the efforts that have been made heretofore to move on a line for the purpose of advancing the Indian tribes of this country on the road to civilization have been obstructed usually by matters of this character, some things that would arouse the feelings of the people in reference to the treatment of some individual Indian or some particular tribe so as to thwart the attempt that was made in the direction I have mentioned. I do not attribute any intention to the Senator from Massachusetts to do anything of this kind, but we all know that it is much more easy to tear down a structure before it is permanently erected than it is to erect one, and that which has been attempted on behalf of the Indians and for the peace and good order of society has nearly always been destroyed to a certain extent by something of this character.

I made the remarks I did not for the purpose of discussing the question of the killing of this Indian, but for the purpose of at least putting my statement on record that I believed the Department had been administered as faithfully, as honestly, and as justly as could be done, and that if these things were not interposed the time had arrived in my judgment when the Senate and when the Congress of the United States might take such action as would be of great advantage and of great interest to all concerned in the advancement of these people in the line upon which we are now attempting to travel.

That was all my object, and I repeat what I said, that I do not think any remarks of this kind are justified in reference to the course of conduct of the Department of the Interior as to any design or desire on the part of the Interior Department to do any wrong to the Indians or the white men. Whether a man comes to us among the drippings from some imperial foreign power or not is immaterial; it is an American citizen who administers that Department. No matter where born or where he breathed the free air of Heaven first, he has the same rights that you and I have under the law, and I do not believe that the criticisms and insinuations are just in reference to that man, so far as the administration of this Department is concerned.

Mr. COKE. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas calls for the unfinished business, which is the Indian severalty bill.

Mr. EATON. I hope my friend will allow me for a moment.

Mr. COKE I yield for a moment.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. EATON. I am requested and urged by the Committee on Foreign Relations to ask the Senate to take up a certain bill of very great importance to this and another government. I move temporarily to lay the Indian severalty bill aside for the purpose of calling that bill up.

Mr. COKE. I cannot yield.

Mr. EATON. Will the gentleman hear me? I move to lay it aside for the purpose of calling the bill up, so that it may follow this bill; that is all; not to take one moment of the time of the Senate. I want it before the Senate.

Mr. COKE. If it gives rise to no discussion I shall consent to the suggestion.

Mr. EATON. It will give rise to not the slightest in the world. If it does I will withdraw my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will announce to the Senator from Connecticut that there is an understanding already of the Senate, that what is known as the General Armstrong bill comes up after the present order is disposed of.

Mr. EATON. I was about to observe that I desire this bill to follow the Armstrong bill. I do not propose to ask the Senate that it shall take precedence of that bill. I desire, if my friend from Texas will allow me, that the Indian severalty bill may be laid aside temporarily, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 2022) in relation to the Japanese indemnity fund; and I shall then ask——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is unnecessary for the Senator to make a motion. If the Senate will agree to it by unanimous consent that will be the understanding.

Mr. EATON. That is all I desire.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the pending order, which is the unfinished business of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. No. 1773) to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians on the various reservations, and to extend the protection of the laws of the States and Territories over the Indians, and for other purposes.

Mr. HARRIS. What is the pending question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The understanding was reached the other day that the bill for the relief of the officers and crew of the brig General Armstrong should come up after the present order of business was disposed of, and the understanding now reached is that the bill indicated by the Senator from Connecticut shall come after that bill.

Mr. HOAR. The Chair has asked for no unanimous consent.

Mr. HARRIS. Is it supposed to be an understanding, by unanimous consent, that these two bills named are to follow the Indian severalty bill in regular order and that the Senate is bound to consider those bills in that order, not having the right to take up any other bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is not the understanding of the Chair. The matter will still be within the disposition of the Senate, and the question will come up if any Senator objects and makes a motion to proceed to the consideration of other business.

Mr. BOOTH. I feel it my duty to state that to-morrow morning, at the expiration of the morning hour, I shall ask the Senate to consider the bill (H. R. No. 6532) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882.

Mr. EATON. An appropriation bill is always in order.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Connecticut can make his application to the Senate when the pending bill is disposed of just as well as now, and if it is a case so strong as to require unanimous consent now, it will be equally strong then.

Mr. COKE. I call for the regular order.

Mr. McPHERSON. Will the Senator from Texas yield to me for a moment?

Mr. COKE. Certainly.

Mr. McPHERSON. I notice that in farming out the time of the Senate in respect to bills that are to follow this particular bill, we appear to have lost sight entirely of the fact that I gave notice last week that I should call up to-day the bill (S. No. 1933) to establish and equalize the grades and regulate appointments and promotions in the Marine Corps. I wish to say that with respect to all other bills which follow the unfinished business, I shall take the liberty of antagonizing every one of them for this important measure, and shall call it up immediately after the conclusion of the discussion on the Indian severalty bill.

LANDS IN SEVERALTY TO INDIANS.

The Senate, as in Committe of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1773) to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians on the various reservations, and to extend the protection of the laws of the States and Territories over the Indians, and for other purposes; the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. MORGAN, to strike out the ninth section of the bill, in the following words:

> That the provisions of this act shall not extend to any tribe of Indians until the consent of two-thirds of the male members twenty-one years of age shall be first had and obtained.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, before the vote is taken on the motion to strike out the ninth section of the bill, I desire to bring to the attention of the Senate some facts collated from the statutes, and some other valuable information, which I think bears essentially upon the proposition to strike out this section of the bill.

Since the year 1830, the 15th day of July, the Congress of the United States has passed sixty-seven laws giving to the Indian tribes in some instances the option to take lands in severalty, and in some instances making grants to them conditional upon their taking lands in severalty. I have a schedule of those acts of Congress, all of which have been based upon the line of policy which is intended now to be made applicable to every Indian in the United States—of giving to the Indians the option to take their lands in severalty in their respective reservations, instead of legislating so as to require them to take lands in severalty; and my purpose in moving to strike out the ninth section of the bill is to leave this law in full force and effect without getting the consent of the Indian tribes to its becoming so. To impose upon the tribes the duty and the necessity of taking lands in severalty wherever they occupy lands under a title of occupancy merely, and not under a title in fee-simple, as in the case of the five civilized tribes.

During the colonial period and during the earlier period of the history of this Government down to 1830, acts of State Legislatures, acts of Colonial Legislatures have been put on the statute-books, and treaties have been resorted to for the purpose of persuading the Indians to take land in severalty. As I have observed we have passed these sixty-seven laws upon this subject, all precisely in line with the enactment now proposed to be adopted, with the exception that, until the Ute bill, we never before gave to the Indians the right to determine whether or not an act of Congress should become a law.

The following is a list of the acts of Congress to which I refer:

What has been the effect of this system, that we might call an inductive system, upon the Indian mind, and what has been the reason of its non-success? The effect has been that not 5 per cent. of the Indians now living in the United States or who have ever lived in the United States under these various laws and treaties have received lands in severalty. They have refused as far as they were able to refuse so to receive their lands. We will not find the Indians ready to accept a system of this kind either specially or universally when it is left to their option to accept it or not to accept it.

With this statement of our legislation I desire to call the attention of the Senate for a moment to a very high authority in reference to the state of Indian law on the subject of tribal organizations, and from this authority will be gathered the reason why the Indians have thus uniformly refused to accept all the provisions which we have tendered them with respect to receiving their lands in severalty. I read from a study of this question by Major Powell, which he has been kind enough to furnish me by request. He treats of the Wyandot government, and perhaps more than two-thirds of the tribes of the Indians of North America were organized in their tribal governments upon the basis of the Wyandot government.

I now present and will read the paper of Major Powell:

WYANDOT GOVERNMENT.

A Short Study of Tribal Society.

In the social organization of the Wyandots four groups are recognized—the family, the gens, the phratry, and the tribe.

THE FAMILY.

The family, as the term is here used, is nearly synonymous with household. It is composed of the persons who occupy one lodge, or, in their permanent wigwams, one section of a communal dwelling. These permanent dwellings are constructed in an oblong form of poles interwoven with bark. The fire was placed in line along the center, and was usually built for two families, one occupying the place on each side of the fire. The head of the family is a woman.

GENS.

The gens is an organized body of consanguineal kindred in the female line. "The woman carries the gens," is the formulated statement by which a Wyandot expresses the idea that descent is in the female line. Each gens has the name of some animal—the ancient of such animal being its tutelar god. Up to the time when the tribe left Ohio eleven gentes were recognized, as follows: Deer, Bear, Highland Turtle, (striped,) Highland Turtle, (black,) Mud Turtle, Smooth Large Turtle, Hawk, Beaver, Wolf, Sea Snake, Porcupine.

In speaking of an individual he is said to be a Wolf, a Bear, or Deer, as the case may be, meaning thereby that he belongs to that gens; but in speaking of the body of people comprising a gens they are said to be relatives of the Wolf, the Bear, or the Deer, as the case may be.

There is a body of names belonging to each gens, so that each person's name indicates the gens to which he belongs. These names are derived from the characteristics, habits, attitudes, or mythologic stories connected with the tutelar god.

The following schedule presents the name of a man and woman in each gens as illustrating this statement:

| | Indian. | English. |
|---|---|---|
| Man of Deer gens | De-wa-ti-re | Lean deer. |
| Woman of Deer gens | A-ya-jin-ta | Spotted fawn. |
| Man of Bear gens | A-ta-e-tés | Long claws. |
| Woman of Bear gens | Tsa-man'-da-ka-é' | Grunting for her young. |
| Man of Striped Turtle gens | Ta-hà-so$^{s}$-ta-ra-ta-se | Going around the lake. |
| Woman of Striped Turtle gens | Tso-we-yûñ-kyn | Gone from the water. |
| Man of Mud Turtle gens | Sha-yan-tsu-wat' | Hard skull. |
| Woman of Mud Turtle gens | Ya$^{s}$-dûsh-shu-rûs | Finding sand beach. |
| Man of smooth large Turtle gens | Hu$^{s}$'-du-cu-ta | Throwing sand. |
| Woman of smooth large Turtle gens | Tau-ca-e$^{s}$' | Slow walker. |
| Man of Wolf gens | Ha-ro'-u$^{s}$-yñ | One who goes about in the dark; a prowler. |
| Woman of Wolf gens | Ya$^{s}$-di-no | Always hungry. |
| Man of Snake gens | Hu-ta-hu'-sa | Sitting in curled position. |
| Women of Snakes gens | Di-je-rons | One who ripples the water. |
| Man of Porcupine gens | Ha$^{s}$-du'-tu$^{s}$ | The one who puts up quills. |
| Woman of Porcupine gens | Ke'-ya-runs-kwa | Good-sighted. |

THE PHRATRY.

There are four phratries in the tribe—the three gentes, bear, deer, and striped turtle, constituting the first; the highland turtle, black turtle, and smooth large turtle, the second; the hawk, beaver and wolf, the third; and the sea-snake and porcupine, the fourth.

This unit in their organization has a mythologic basis and is chiefly used for religious purposes, in the preparation of medicines, and in festivals and games.

The eleven gentes as four phratries constitute the tribe.

Such is the social organization of the Wyandots.

Each gens is a body of consanguineal kindred in the female line, and each gens is allied to other gentes by consanguineal kinship through the male line, and by affinity through marriage.

To be a member of the tribe it is necessary to be a member of a gens; to be a member of a gens it is necessary to belong to some family; and to belong to a family a person must have been born in the family, so that his kinship is recognized or he must be adopted into a family and become a son, brother, or some definite relative; and this artificial relationship gives him the same standing as actual relationship in the family, in the gens, in the phratry, and in the tribe.

Thus the tribe is a body of kindred.

Of the four groups thus described, the gens, the phratry, and the tribe constitute the series of organic units; the family or household as here described is not a unit of the gens or phratry as two gentes are represented in each—the father must belong to one gens, and the mother and her children to another.

GOVERNMENT.

Society is maintained by the establishment of government, for rights must be recognized and duties performed.

In this tribe there is found a complete differentiation of the military from the civil government.

Civil government.—The civil government inheres in a system of councils and chiefs.

In each gens there is a council composed of four women, called Yu-wai-yu-wá-na. These four women councilors select a chief of the gens from its male members; that is, from their brothers and sons. This gentile chief is the head of the gentile council.

The council of the tribe is composed of the aggregated gentile councils. The tribal council, therefore, is composed one-fifth of men and four-fifths of women.

The sachem of the tribe, or tribal chief, is chosen by the chiefs of the gentes.

There is sometimes a grand council of the gens, composed of the councilors of the gens proper, and all the heads of households, and leading men—brothers and sons.

There is, also, sometimes a grand council of the tribe, composed of the council of the tribe proper and the heads of households of the tribe, and all the leading men of the tribe.

These grand councils are convened for special purposes.

Methods of choosing and installing councilors and chiefs.—The four women councilors of the gens are chosen by the heads of the households, themselves being women. There is no formal election, but frequent discussion is had over the matter from time to time, in which a sentiment grows up within the gens and throughout the tribe that in the event of the death of any councilor a certain person will take her place.

In this manner there is usually one, two, or more potential councilors in each gens who are expected to attend all the meetings of the council, though they take no part in the deliberations and have no vote.

When a woman is installed as councilor, a feast is prepared by the gens to which she belongs, and to this feast all the members of the tribe are invited. The woman is painted and dressed in her best attire, and the sachem of the tribe places upon her head the gentile chaplet of feathers, and announces in a formal manner to the assembled guests that the woman has been chosen a councilor. The ceremony is followed by feasting and dancing, often continued late into the night.

The gentile chief is chosen by the council women, after consultation with the other women and men of the gens. Often the gentile chief is a potential chief through a period of probation. During this time he attends the meetings of the council, but takes no part in their deliberations and has no vote.

At his installation the council women invest him with an elaborately ornamented tunic, place upon his head a chaplet of feathers, and paint the gentile totem on his face. The sachem of the tribe then announces to the people that the man has been made chief of the gens and admitted to the council. This is also followed by a festival.

The sachem of the tribe is selected by the men belonging to the council of the tribe. Formerly the sachemship inhered in the bear gens, but at present he is chosen from the deer gens, from the fact, as the Wyandots say, that death has carried away all the wise men of the bear gens.

The chief of the wolf gens is the herald and sheriff of the tribe. He superintends the erection of the council-house and has the care of it. He calls the council together in a formal manner when directed by the sachem. He announces to the tribe all the decisions of the council, and executes the directions of the council and of the sachem.

Gentile councils are held frequently from day to day and from week to week, and are called by the chief whenever deemed necessary. When matters before the council are considered of great importance, a grand council of the gens may be called.

The tribal council is held regularly on the night of the full moon of each lunation and at such other times as the sachem may determine; but extra councils are usually called by the sachem at the request of a number of councillors.

Meetings of the gentile councils are very informal; but the meetings of the tribal councils are conducted with due ceremony. When all the persons are assembled the chief of the wolf gens calls them to order, fills and lights a pipe, sends one puff of smoke to the heavens and another to the earth. The pipe is then handed to the sachem, who fills his mouth with smoke, and, turning from left to right with the sun, slowly puffs it out over the heads of the councilors, who are sitting in a circle. He then hands the pipe to the man on his left, and it is smoked in turn by each person until it has been passed around the circle. The sachem then explains the object for which the council is called. Each person in the way and manner he chooses tells what he thinks should be done in the case. If a majority of the council is agreed as to action, the sachem does not speak, but may simply announce the decision. But in some cases there may be protracted debate, which is carried on with great deliberation. In case of a tie, the sachem is expected to speak.

It is considered dishonorable for any man to reverse his decision after having spoken.

Such are the organic elements of the Wyandot government.

Functions of civil government.—It is the function of government to preserve rights and enforce the performance of duties. Rights and duties are correlative. Rights imply duties and duties imply rights. The right inhering in the party of the first part imposes a duty on the party of the second part. The right and its correlative duty are inseparable parts of a relation that must be maintained by government; and the relations which governments are established to maintain may be treated under the general head of rights.

In Wyandot government these rights may be classed as follows: First, rights of marriage; second, rights to names; third, rights to personal adornments; fourth, rights of order in encampments and migrations; fifth, rights of property; sixth, rights of person; seventh, rights of community; eighth, rights of religion.

To maintain rights rules of conduct are established, not by formal enactment, but by regulated usage. Such custom-made laws may be called regulations.

Marriage regulation.—Marriage between members of the same gens is forbidden, but consanguineal marriages between persons of different gentes are permitted. For example, a man may not marry his mother's sister's daughter, as she belongs to the same gens with himself, but he can marry his father's sister's daughter, because she belongs to a different gens.

Husbands retain all their rights and privileges in their own gentes, though they live with the gentes of their wives. Children, irrespective of sex, belong to the gens of the mother. Men and women must marry within the tribe. A woman taken to wife from without the tribe must first be adopted into some family of a gens other than that to which the man belongs. That a woman may take for a husband a man without the tribe, he must also be adopted into the family of some gens other than that of the woman. What has been called by some ethnologists endogamy and exogamy, are correlative parts of one regulation, and the Wyandots, like all other tribes of which we have any knowledge in North America, are both endogamous and exogamous.

Polygamy is permitted, but the wives must belong to different gentes. The first wife remains the head of the household. Polyandry is prohibited. A man seeking a wife consults her mother, sometimes direct and sometimes through his own mother. The mother of the girl advises with the women councilors to obtain their consent, and the young people usually submit quietly to their decision. Sometimes the women councilors consult with the men.

When a girl is betrothed, the man makes such presents to the mother as he can. It is customary to consummate the marriage before the end of the moon in which the betrothal is made. Bridegroom and bride make promises of faithfulness to the parents and women councilors of both parties. It is customary to give a marriage feast, in which the gentes of both parties take part. For a short time at least, bride and groom live with the bride's mother, or rather in the original household of the bride.

The time when they will set up housekeeping for themselves is usually arranged before marriage.

In the event of the death of the mother the children belong to her sister or to her nearest female kin, the matter being settled by the council women of the gens. As the children belong to the mother, on the death of the father the mother and children are cared for by her nearest male relative until subsequent marriage.

Name regulations.—It has been previously explained that there is a body of names the exclusive property of each gens. Once a year, at the green-corn festival, the council women of the gens select the names for the children born during the previous year, and the chief of the gens proclaims these names at the festival. No person may change his name, but every person, man or woman, by honorable or dishonorable conduct, or by remarkable circumstance, may win a second name, commemorative of deed or circumstance, which is a kind of title.

Regulations of personal adornment.—Each clan has a distinctive method of painting the face, a distinctive chaplet to be worn by the gentile chief and council women when they are inaugurated, and, subsequently, at festival occasions, and distinctive ornaments for all its members, to be used at festivals and religious ceremonies.

Regulations of order in encampment and migrations.—The camp of the tribe is in an open circle, or horseshoe, and the gentes camp in the following order, beginning on the left, and going around to the right: Deer, Bear, Highland Turtle, (striped,) Highland Turtle, (black,) Mud Turtle, Smooth Large Turtle, Hawk, Beaver, Wolf, Sea Snake, Porcupine.

The order in which the households camp in the gentile group is regulated by the gentile councilors, and adjusted from time to time in such a manner that the oldest family is placed on the left and the youngest on the right. In migrations and expeditions the order of travel follows the analogy of encampment.

Property rights.—Within the area claimed by the tribe each gens occupies a smaller tract for the purpose of cultivation. The right of the gens to cultivate a particular tract is a matter settled in the council of the tribe, and the gens may abandon one tract for another only with the consent of the tribe. The women councilors partition the gentile land among the householders, and the household tracts are distinctly marked by them. The ground is repartitioned once in two years. The heads of households are responsible for the cultivation of the tract, and should this duty be neglected the council of the gens calls the responsible parties to account.

Cultivation is communal; that is, all of the able-bodied women of the gens take part in the cultivation of each household tract in the following manner: the head of the household sends her brother or son into the forest or to the stream to bring in game or fish for a feast; then the able-bodied women of the gens are invited to assist in the cultivation of the land, and when this work is done a feast is given.

The wigwam or lodge and all articles of the household belong to the woman—the head of the household—and at her death are inherited by her eldest daughter, or nearest of female kin. The matter is settled by the council women. If the husband die his property is inherited by his brother or his sister's son, except such portion as may be buried with him. His property consists of his clothing, hunting and fishing implements, and such articles as are used personally by himself.

Usually a small canoe is the individual property of the man. Large canoes are made by the male members of the gentes and are the property of the gentes.

Rights of person.—Each individual has a right to freedom of person and security from personal and bodily injury, unless adjudged guilty of crime by proper authority.

Community rights.—Each gens has the right to the services of all its women in the cultivation of the soil. Each gens has the right to the service of all of its male members in avenging wrongs, and the tribe has the right to the service of all its male members in time of war.

Rights of religion.—Each phratry has the right to certain religious ceremonies and the preparation of certain medicines. Each gens has the exclusive right to worship its tutelar god, and each individual has the exclusive right to the possession and use of a particular amulet.

Crimes.—The violations of rights are crimes. Some of the crimes recognized by the Wyandots are as follows: 1, adultery; 2, theft; 3, maiming; 4, murder; 5, treason; 6, witchcraft.

A maiden guilty of fornication may be punished by her mother or female guardian, but if the crime is flagrant and repeated so as to become a matter of general gossip, and the mother fails to correct it, the matter may be taken up by the council-women of the gens.

A woman guilty of adultery for the first offense is punished by having her hair cropped; for repeated offenses her left ear is cut off.

Theft.—The punishment for theft is twofold restitution. When the prosecutor and prosecuted belong to the same gens, the trial is before the council of the gens, and from it there is no appeal. If the parties involved are of different gentes, the prosecutor, through the head of his household, lays the matter before the council of his own gens; by it the matter is laid before the gentile council of the accused in a formal manner. Thereupon it becomes the duty of the council of the accused to investigate the facts for themselves, and to settle the matter with the council of the plaintiff. Failure thus to do is followed by retaliation in the seizing of any property of the gens which may be found.

Maiming.—Maiming is compounded, and the method of procedure in prosecution is essentially the same as for theft.

Murder.—In the case of murder, if both parties are members of the same gens, the matter is tried by the gentile council on complaint of the head of the household, but there may be an appeal to the council of the tribe. Where the parties belong to different gentes, complaint is formally made by the injured party, through the chief of his gens, in the following manner:

A wooden tablet is prepared, upon which is inscribed the totem or heraldic emblem of the injured man's gens, and a picture-writing setting forth the offense follows. The gentile chief appears before the chief of the council of the gens of the offender, and formally states the offense, explaining the picture-writing, which is then delivered. A council of the offender's gens is thereupon called and a trial is held. It is the duty of this council to examine the evidence for themselves and to come to a conclusion without further presentation of the matter on the part of the person aggrieved. Having decided the matter among themselves, they appear before the chief of the council of the aggrieved party to offer compensation. If the gens of the offender fails to settle the matter with the gens of the aggrieved party, it is the duty of his nearest relative to avenge the wrong. Either party may appeal to the council of the tribe. The appeal must be made in due form by the presentation of a tablet of accusation.

Inquiry into the effect of a failure to observe prescribed formalities developed an interesting fact. In procedure against crime, failure in formality is not considered a violation of the rights of the accused, but proof of his innocence. It is considered supernatural evidence that the charges are false. In trials for all offenses forms of procedure are, therefore, likely to be earnestly questioned.

Treason.—Treason consists in revealing the secrets of the medicine preparations or giving other information or assistance to enemies of the tribe, and is punished by death. The trial is before the council of the tribe.

Witchcraft.—Witchcraft is punished by death—stabbing, tomahawking, or burning. Charges of witchcraft are investigated by the grand council of the tribe. When the accused is adjudged guilty he may appeal to supernatural judgment. The test is by fire. A circular fire is built on the ground, through which the accused must run from east to west, and then from north to south. If no injury is received he is adjudged innocent; if he falls into the fire he is adjuged guilty. Should a person accused or having the general reputation of practicing witchcraft become deaf, blind, or have sore eyes, earache, headache, or other diseases considered loathsome, he is supposed to have failed in practicing his arts upon others and to have fallen a victim to them himself. Such cases are most likely to be punished.

Outlawry.—The institution of outlawry exists among the Wyandots in a peculiar form. An outlaw is one who by his crimes has placed himself without the protection of his clan. A man can be declared an outlaw by his own clan, who thus publish to the tribe that they will not defend him in case he is injured by another. But usually outlawry is declared only after trial before the tribal council.

The method of procedure is analogous to that in case of murder. When the person has been adjudged guilty and sentence of outlawry declared, it is the duty of the chief of the Wolf Clan to make known the decision of the council. This he does by appearing before each clan in the order of its encampment and declaring in terms the crimes of the outlaw and the sentence of outlawry, which may be either of two grades.

In the lowest grade it is declared that if the man shall thereafter continue in the commission of similar crimes, it will be lawful for any person to kill him, and if killed, rightfully or wrongfully, his clan will not avenge his death.

Outlawry of the highest degree makes it the duty of any member of the tribe who may meet with the offender to kill him.

Military government.—The management of military affairs inheres in the military council and chief; the military council is composed of all the able-bodied men of the tribe; the military chief is chosen by the council from the Porcupine gens. Each gentile chief is responsible for the military training of the youth under his authority. There is usually one or more potential military chiefs who are the close companions and assistants of the chief in time of war, and in case of the death of the chief take his place in the order of seniority.

Prisoners of war are adopted into the tribe or killed. To be adopted into the tribe it is necessary that the prisoner should be adopted into some family. The warrior taking the prisoner has the first right to adopt him, and his male or female relations have the right in the order of their kinship. If no one claims the prisoner for this purpose, he is caused to run the gauntlet as a test of his courage. If at his trial he behaves manfully, claimants are not wanting, but if he behaves disgracefully he is put to death.

Fellowhood.—There is an interesting institution found among the Wyandots as among some other of our North American tribes, namely, that of fellowhood. Two young men agree to be perpetual friends to each other, or more than brothers. Each reveals to the other the secrets of his life, and counsels with him on matters of importance, and defends him from wrong and violence, and at his death is chief mourner.

The government of the Wyandots, with the social organization upon which it is based, affords a typical example of tribal government throughout North America. Within that area there are several hundred distinct governments. In so great a number there is great variety, and in this variety we find different degrees of organization; the degree of organization being determined by the differentiation of the functions of government and the correlative specialization of organic elements.

Much has yet to be done in the study of these governments before safe generalizations may be made. But enough is known to warrant the following statement:

Tribal government in North America is based on kinship in that the fundamental units of social organization are bodies of consanguineal kindred either in the male or female line; these units being what has been well denominated "gentes." These "gentes" are organized into tribes by ties of relationship and affinity, and this organization is of such a character that the man's position in the tribe is fixed by his kinship. There is no place in a tribe for any person whose kinship is not fixed, and only those persons can be adopted into the tribe who are adopted into some family with artificial kinship specified. The fabric of Indian society is a complex tissue of kinship—the warp is made of streams of kinship blood, and the woof of marriage ties.

With most tribes military and civil affairs are differentiated. The functions of civil government are in general differentiated only to this extent: that executive functions are performed by chiefs and sachems; but these chiefs and sachems are also members of the council. The council is legislature and court. Perhaps it were better to say that the council is the court whose decisions are law, and that the legislative body properly has not been developed.

In general crimes are well defined. Procedure is formal, and forms are held as of such importance that error therein is prima facie evidence that the subject-matter formulated was false.

When one gens charges crime against a member of another, it can of its own motion proceed only to retaliation. To prevent retaliation the gens of the offender must take the necessary steps to disprove the crime or to compound or punish it. The charge once made is held as just and true until it has been disproved, and in trial the cause of the defendant is first stated. The anger of the prosecuting gens must be placated.

In the tribal governments there are many institutions, customs, and traditions which give evidence of a former condition in which society was based not upon kinship, but upon marriage.

From a survey of the facts, it seems highly probable that kinship society as it exists among the tribes of North America has developed from connubial society, which is discovered elsewhere on the globe. In fact, there are few tribes that seem scarcely to have passed that indefinite boundary between the two social states. Philologic research leads to the same conclusion.

Nowhere in North America have a people been discovered who have passed beyond tribal society to national society based on property, i. e., that form of society which is characteristic of civilization. Some peoples may not have reached kinship society; none have passed it.

Nations with civilized institutions, art with palaces, monotheism as the worship of the Great Spirit, all vanish from the pristine condition of North America in the light of anthropologic research.

Tribes with the social institutions of kinship, art with its highest architectural development exhibited in the structure of communal dwellings, and polytheism in the worship of mythic animals and nature-gods remain.

This report is very instructive, coming from so high an authority, and covering as it does completely, I think, the whole ground of philosophical inquiry into this very hidden and involved subject. It will not prove unacceptable to the faithful student of the subject of Indian government, though it may be wearying to the Senate.

Mr. President, we find here that the dissolution of the Indian family relationship is the dissolution of all tribal relationship; it is the abrogation of the tribal institution. As long as that tribal institution continues it will hold to what it is based upon, and that is the commune in all that relates to lands. The North American Indians are not the only people who hold to this. All Syria, all Central Asia and Russia are filled with instances of lands held in common. There has not been one instance in the history of the Indians of North America, commencing with the Aztecs, with their comparatively splendid civilization, down to the present time where they have ever enacted laws to hold lands in severalty. An Indian title in severalty to a tract of land derived from an Indian tribe is a matter that is unknown in the history of the Indians on this continent. It is not known even among the civilized tribes. As I remarked before when addressing the Senate, it is a matter of religion with them that their communal interest in lands should not be interfered with.

I know we have got to get rid of the subject; we have to strike at the root: and in order to do it effectually we need not expect to get the consent of the Indians. They will not aid us thus to strike at their institutions. We must now commence to govern them. The proper way to commence to govern them is to have written laws that will bear directly upon them. Let the laws be just and wise, but do not hesitate to lay your hand upon the plow, and then never look back when you march in the direction of the civilization of the Indians.

I have before remarked that it is an opportune time to commence this work. One of my purposes in moving to strike out the ninth section of this bill is to enable us to commence a system of positive government in reference to the Indians, and not undertake to repeat in one broad and comprehensive law that which has failed in sixty-seven different acts of Congress that we have passed. Why are we passing this universal law when sixty-seven statutes are upon the book, each of which intends to accomplish the same purpose in regard to about ninety tribes of Indians? What reason is there for it? I must be permitted to say that looking at the features of this bill I cannot conceal it from my own mind and conscience that there is a reason much deeper than the advantage which it is expected will be derived by the Indians. You will have a provision here that the law shall not take effect until two-thirds of the male members of each tribe consent to it, and yet when you come to dispose of the communal lands now held by them in common, after you have made the location of the Indians upon separate tracts of land, you dispense with your two-thirds requirement, and a bare majority of the Indians can then dispose of the land of all the rest. That is the bill.

What must a ring of land pirates do in order to accomplish a confiscation of the lands of the Indians? When you have passed this bill you will find fifty rings in the United States that will spring up in fifty days for the purpose of grabbing the Indian lands. What will the rings do? They will go to a tribe of Indians and say to the men who are in poverty, in distress, perhaps, "Come, now, take a drink; take a little red paint, a few beads, some powder and ball, some guns, some trinkets, some toys, and go into council with us, and we will make an arrangement by which the Government of the United States can get the consent of two-thirds of your people to accept the provisions of that law." All right; the Indian goes in. In that manner two-thirds of the tribe have given their consent, and then the law shall operate upon them. Then you proceed, after the law has become effectual, to the location of the Indians upon the lands, and after you have done that a body of land remains in common to be sold. Then the ring men strike the Indians home. Then it is that having got the tribe in their power really, they proceed to buy out the balance of their great territory, and get Congress to confirm the bargain.

In the remarks which I have made before the Senate I have shown that as many as three thousand Indians in this country have the control of twelve million acres of land under the existing regulations, and by the effect of this bill you change the nature of the title by which the Indians hold it. The very moment that they accept the provisions of this bill their title, which now rests simply upon the ground of the right of occupancy under treaty stipulations, is converted into a fee, and after that you have to get the title out of them by a conveyance of the fee-simple. By this means you enable three thousand Indians to dispose absolutely of twelve million acres of land. After you have passed this law, and, as I have remarked before, after you have sanctioned their title both by contract and by grant, you find yourself unable ever more to get it back again.

Some members of the committee have congratulated themselves and the country that if this law did not operate beneficially it could be repealed. Mr. President, once you put this law upon the statute-book you will never repeal it. You have got laws upon the statute-book now in reference to mining rights which we have copied from the Spanish Government, in the western country, and all the powers of the Congress of the United States could not get rid of them to-day. Pass this bill and put these rings into motion for the purpose of gathering and absorbing these lands, this immense domain thus granted and confirmed to the Indians both by contract and by law, and you will not in twenty-five years repeal it. When the rings get possession of it they will never let you repeal it; they will hold on to it, and their influence will be felt in both branches of the Congress of the United States to that extent that we will be powerless ever to shake them off.

This bill will consign these lands and these Indians to that condition, and it is only because I have felt that we are getting ourselves into a condition where extrication would hereafter be impossible that I have ventured to have so much to say about the measure. No man regrets more than I do the necessity which I have felt was incumbent upon me, believing and feeling as I do in regard to this matter, at least to lay before the Senate of the United States facts that are undeniable, which I think should challenge their attention when they vote upon this matter, and admonish Senators to look carefully into this important measure.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. President, I hope that the amendment that is proposed by the Senator from Alabama will not prevail. I think that section 9 of the bill ought not to be stricken out. While I think we have the power and probably the right to manage this affair in our own way, still I believe that these Indians do have some rights under the treaty regulations that should be respected. We have for more than three-quarters of a century, at any rate, respected these treaties as being binding upon us, and it is only within the last decade that they have been set aside by decisions of the courts. Now, of course we can be governed by these decisions and can no doubt legislate in just such way as we feel we ought to do or that we are disposed to do. But if you strike out the ninth section of the bill you force every tribe to come in whether willing or not and accept the terms of this bill. I do not believe that we ought to attempt it in that way. If you leave it as it is now, it requires the consent of two-thirds of the tribe before the bill can be enforced upon them, or before they can be required to accept the terms of the bill.

I should say here that Indians are very much like white men in one particular at any rate, that is you may lead them, you may coax them, but you cannot drive them very well into that which is not acceptable to them. On that account I think it would work against the effects of the bill rather than in its favor. I believe, then, that we ought to have the consent of the Indians in some way, and I believe if we get the consent of two-thirds we will very soon get the consent of the rest, because two-thirds will very soon draw the rest with them, and we will thus have their general consent, and in that way we may carry out the provisions of this bill and at the same time give better satisfaction than if we try to force the Indians to accept the proposed terms.

I am aware that this is a very difficult question to be settled. I am aware, as was said by one of the Senators yesterday, that this question probably will be kept before the country for years and years together, even though we should pass this bill or any other measure like it; but this is an entering wedge, as I think, to this question. It is a step in the right direction, and that direction leads us to make citizens of them and to require the same of the Indian that we require of the white man. I think that no harm can come of this measure. We have treated the Indian in all the various ways that could be thought of—first, as aliens; treating with them next as wards, not able to take care of themselves, but as persons who must be taken care of by the nation. And now under this bill it is proposed to make them citizens and to deal with them as we do with other human beings and other citizens of the United States.

I believe that if we will take this step it will be the first great step toward settling this great Indian question, and it is the greatest question, in my opinion, that is to-day before the Congress of the United States. I know of no question to-day that is equal to this in importance. Here we have the Indians scattered over twelve of the States and nine of the Territories of this Government. We have nearly one hundred and fifty tribes of Indians. We have now some sixty-seven agencies scattered in these different States and Territories. The whites have completely surrounded them, and are driving them as fast from the West as they were a few years ago driven from the East. And now the question is what will you do with them. Shall they not now be made useful members of society in some way? The bow and arrow have got to give way to the plow and the hoe; they have got to make their living by the sweat of their face as white men make it. We must meet the question in some way, must deal with them if not as white men yet as human beings, and not compel them, as the amendment would if adopted, to accept the provisions of the bill whether they are willing or not. By this section as it stands we invite them by a two-thirds majority to take hold of this matter, and to come in and take part with us. Let us not deal too harshly with them, but rather let us show them that they are to be consulted and are not to be forced to accept whether they may deem it for the best or not.

As I said the other day, I have some personal knowledge of the Indians. In my own State they have made such advancement in civilization that I believe there is no question with them as to what they can do and what they would do if they were given an opportunity to own lands in severalty and to have homes secured to them the same as white men have. Some others, the semi-civilized tribes, are begging us now to give them title to their homes. There are men around this Capitol to-day who are begging Congress to pass a bill that is now upon the Senate table proposing to divide up the lands in severalty to the Peoria and Miami tribes of Indians. They say that every Indian of their tribes is ready for it; that all are ready to accept their lands, and will promise to take care of themselves, and would ask nothing from the Government hereafter but what the Government owes him. Then why not give it to them? I do not expect all the Indians to accept the provisions of this bill at once, nor will it be done very soon; but a very fair proportion of them will, in my opinion, do so, and thus an example will be set which will by and by be followed by others and it may be by all.

When our committee visited the Omaha Indians two years ago, seeking information on the subject of Indian affairs and inquiring whether it would not be better to turn their management over to the War Department, they said "we want no warriors, no military officers to take care of us, but we want a title to our land the same as a white man has it; you give a white man a title which cannot be taken from him, but you give us one that you can by an act of Congress take from us. Why don't you treat us like you treat white men?"

In my opinion, Mr. President, we owe it to these people, who are seeking the opportunity to become citizens, to give them an equal chance with other human beings. With my knowledge of the Indian character it would not be best to adopt this amendment, and therefore I shall oppose the amendment as proposed by the Senator from Alabama, and hope it may be defeated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. MORGAN,] to strike out the ninth section of the bill, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. PLUMB. I offer an amendment to section 9, on which the vote has just been taken, which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add at the end of section 9:

Provided, That the President may, in his discretion, make allotment of land in severalty, as hereinbefore provided, to any one or more Indian members of a tribe or band, upon the request of such Indian or Indians, irrespective of the action of such tribe or band; and when allotment of land shall be made to any Indian the head of a family, allotment shall be made to the members of such family, as hereinbefore provided, in case where division is made among the members of an entire tribe or band. Such allotment of lands shall dissolve the tribal relation of such Indian or Indians, but shall not impair their proper proportionate right to the lands, funds, or other property of such tribe remaining undisturbed; which said proportion shall be paid them on the final distribution of the funds and property of said tribe, except as to annuities in money or in kind, which shall be paid as though the tribal relation had not been dissolved.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, I should be glad to have the attention of the members of the committee who have charge of the bill to this amendment. We have voted now, in substance, that the only cases in which lands shall be taken in severalty shall be those where the tribe as a tribe acts upon the question, and that only in cases where two-thirds of the members of the tribe consent the President shall proceed to allot lands in severalty to the members of such tribe. I think that will prove ineffective and will not accomplish fully the intention which the committee have in pressing the passage of this bill, and for several reasons.

In the first place, I think there may be tribes in which two-thirds of the members are competent to take care of themselves and who might desire, or at least who might be induced, to vote that they do desire to dissolve the tribal relation and take their lands in severalty, while the other third of the tribe would be totally unfitted for separate and individual action, persons to whom the tribal relation is a protection. The bill provides that where it becomes operative on a tribe the members shall take the benefit of the act within five years after the allotments have been made upon a particular reservation. I have no doubt that if that should be applied to members of tribes who have not consented to the change many of them would not claim these allotments at all; they would neglect to take advantage of the provisions of the bill, and would therefore cut themselves off from its benefit entirely and would become vagabonds and paupers, whom the Government would be under obligation to support. And in fact as to most of this class the result would be the same even if they should claim the allotment of land to which they were entitled. Giving up the tribal relation under compulsion, and being wholly unfitted for the independent individual relation they had been compelled to assume, the result could not be otherwise than disastrous.

Another class of cases would be that of tribes where two-thirds of the members acting under the control of the chiefs, or for purposes of their own, connected with the tribal organization, would refuse to accept of the provisions of the bill. It is worth while to be a chief of a tribe. The position carries with it many benefits and advantages. The influence of the chiefs over the other members is frequently very potential, and there would be many cases in which the two-thirds influenced by the chiefs would decline to avail themselves of the provisions of the bill and would retain their tribal relation and all their land. That would operate to deny the benefits of the bill to such individual Indians—members of the tribe, but less than two-thirds of the whole—as might desire to take advantage of it, and would prevent the breaking up of the tribal relation, which is not only desirable, but which this bill is specially designed to effect, and would operate to retain in the hands of the tribe the large bodies of land now held by them.

It is useless to talk about reversing now the policy which this Government has heretofore observed in regard to Indian reservations. From the time when the white people landed upon the North American Continent down to the present time, whenever an Indian reservation has stood in the way of white settlement or progress of any kind, or in the way even of the greed of the white man, the Indian and his title to the land have been obliged to give way; and we are not going to change that now. On the contrary, the case is aggravated. The area of Government land is gradually but rapidly diminishing. The time is coming, and within a very few years, when the Government will have no land to give to the people who desire to leave the overcrowded East. These people will not be satisfied to remain landless while the Indians are holding large areas which they do not cultivate and which they do not need. They will conspire, as they always have done, to deprive the Indian of his possessions, and they will not conspire in vain. The cry for lands on the part of the landless will be potent as always heretofore, and by the agency of treaties extorted from the Indian, or by forcible occupancy, ultimately to be sanctioned by Congress, the coveted land will be acquired.

The right of the tribes in the Indian Territory to their reservations has been sanctioned by legislation covering a long period of years, and yet we have had the spectacle during the last year of a combination of white people gathering along the northern border of that territory, and only prevented from going in and taking possession of the land by the presence of United States troops. Settlers cannot be kept out of the Indian Territory long by processes of that kind. They never have been kept out for any considerable length of time, and they will not be kept out now. Whenever we set up a barrier to the exercise of the right, of the privilege, of the individual Indian or any considerable number of the Indians, to land in severalty and endeavor to keep these reservations intact, we only make a barrier which when it comes to be broken down will be broken down wholly and entirely by reason of the accumulation of men and of interests which demand it, and which become stronger than even Congress and the Executive.

This is going to be more so hereafter than it has been heretofore, for the reason, as I said, that the area of public lands has been very much diminished. Within twenty years there will not be an acre of corn land on the American continent that will not be worth $50. The people who come from the States of the East, from the places where population is beginning to crowd production, will more and more need the surplus lands, and will be less liable to be controlled than heretofore, and the Government can only meet the inevitable by taking steps in advance which shall gradually, and in accordance with law and in accordance with justice and the rights of the Indians, release their hold upon these large bodies of land which they cannot use.

The action proposed by the amendment which I have submitted is in accordance with precedents that have been established, under which the Government has operated with reference to many tribes of Indians. I find in the act of Congress concerning the Miami Indians of March 3, 1873, in section 3, that the Government in that case provided that certain Indians who should so desire might become citizens of the United States, and on presenting a certificate of the court before whom they had been naturalized, the Secretary of the Interior should proceed to allot to them lands in severalty, which they should hold in fee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the page?

Mr. PLUMB. It is volume 17, page 631, of the statutes.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not want to disturb the Senator from Kansas, but I should be glad to have him tell the Senate what the effect of that law has been in the State of Kansas. I believe the Miamies, a portion of them at least, are inhabitants of the State of Kansas.

Mr. PLUMB. I will proceed to state before I get through what the effect of that has been. The concluding portion of the section is as follows:

On the presentation of said certificate—

That is, the certificate of naturalization—

to the Secretary of the Interior, with satisfactory proof of identity, he may, at the request of such person or persons, cause the lands severally held by them and their minor children to be conveyed to them by patent in fee-simple, without the power of alienation, and may, at his discretion, cause to be paid to them, from time to time, their proportion of all the moneys and effects of said tribe held for them by the United States, or which may be received as the net proceeds of the sale of lands under the provisions of this act; after which said Indians and their minor children shall cease to be members of any tribe; but the lands so patented to them shall not be subject to levy, taxation, or sale during the natural lives of said Indians or of their minor children.

Under the provisions of that act between fifty and sixty members of the Miami tribe of Indians took land in severalty. I have recently made inquiry from several sources in regard to the fate which overtook those Indians. They are living in the State of Kansas to-day in independence, that is to say, independent of the Government, receiving no annuity at all, not living upon charity, but taking care of themselves, earning a livelihood which is satisfactory to them at least, and which is no imposition to their neighbors. I may say further that as to some of them they have prospered; they are doing well. None of them are conspicuous for their poverty or for their incapacity or for their lack of thrift. The remaining portion of the tribe went to the Indian Territory and took land in common. They themselves, largely moved by the conduct and example of their brethren who remained in Kansas, have now come here and are petitioning Congress that they too may have their lands alloted in severalty. The experiment in that case worked well.

In 1871 Congress, in dealing with the Osage tribe of Indians and providing for the sale of their reservation in the State of Kansas, enacted:

That each half-breed or mixed-blood of the Osages, being twenty-one years of age, or the head of a family, shall, under such rules and regulations and on such proofs as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, be entitled to enter, without cost, within the diminished reservation of the Osage Indians in Kansas, a tract of land, in compact form and by legal subdivisions, not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres, upon which such half-breed or mixed-blood has heretofore actually settled and made improvements: Provided, however, That such half-breed or mixed-blood so entering such land shall thereby forfeit all claim to lands within the Indian Territory which have been or shall be purchased out of the proceeds of the sale of the land of the Osages, in the State of Kansas.

Congress, also, by a treaty with the Delaware Indians, made the 6th day of May, 1854, in the eleventh article of that treaty, stipulated that—

At any time hereafter, when the Delawares desire it, and at their request and expense, the President may cause the country reserved for their permanent home to be surveyed in the same manner as the ceded country is surveyed, and may assign such portion to each person or family as shall be designated by the principal men of the tribe.

By the treaty of 1860 the Delawares represented to the Government their desire that the eleventh article of the treaty of 1854 might be carried out. It was carried out, and there was assigned to such of the Delaware Indians as desired it lands in severalty in the State of Kansas, which they continue to occupy and own to-day. The remaining portion of the tribe ultimately went to the Indian Territory, some two or three hundred in number, and are now living there as other tribes of Indians in that Territory, holding their lands in common.

There are to-day, as I am told, some fifty or seventy-five or perhaps more members of the Osage tribe of Indians who desire to have land set apart to them in severalty, and who desire that the Government may in addition to that give them their share, or a portion at least of their share, of the funds due to the tribe now held in the Treasury of the United States. They believe they are competent to take care of themselves. It is not a tribal ambition but it is an individual ambition. It is that individuality which, I take it, it is the purpose of this bill to encourage, and it is that ambition which alone can ever take those Indians out of their dependent condition. There can never be such a thing as a tribal ambition to take land in severalty; it must be the ambition of the individual Indian, the same as it is the ambition of any white man to have his own estate to himself. If we set up, then, fifty or sixty or any other considerable number of a tribe of Indians for themselves, if our theory about this is correct, and we must try in order to find out, then we have got so many lumps of leaven to leaven the remaining portion of the tribe; we have got so many examples, not on the part of white men whom they might regard as hostile, not on the part of white men to whom different conditions attach, but on the part of members of the tribe, persons related to the remaining members of the tribe, bound to them by ties of blood, by common interest to a large degree. We have got the example of these men, I say, to bear upon the remaining members of the tribe and enable them not only to see how the thing works, but to inspire in them an ambition to be themselves set apart in due time upon their own land, and to have a chance to work out their salvation in their own way.

I think myself that if the bill is to be passed as it came from the committee, without some amendment such as I have proposed, it will result in destroying some tribe entirely without any corresponding benefit to the members of the tribe. I think there are many tribes that under the operation of this bill never will take land in severalty, and we shall have, year by year, to witness the crowding of the tide of emigration upon the boundaries of their reservations, and we shall be constantly appealed to to interpose by the strong arm of the military power of the Government to prevent the trespasses which we know are inevitable, and which we know in the long run we have not the power to prevent.

If these Indians then are to be provided for: if they are to accommodate themselves to the new condition of things; if they are to become self-supporting; if they are to cease to be an impediment in the march of emigration and of progress, it must be because the instinct of individuality, of self-interest, shall have full sway upon the members of the tribes, and they shall thereby be encouraged and determined to cut loose from the tribal organization each one for himself, and, on account of the interests that appeal to him personally, to take a position independent of the tribe. Unless we do have some such provision as this we shall not be able to enforce this law either with justice to the Indian, or with justice to the people or to the Government.

We cannot dodge this question. This bill has been spoken of as experimental, as all other legislation concerning the Indians has been experimental, but we have got to the point that the experiment is going to either kill or cure. We cannot deal with the Indians any longer as we have dealt with them heretofore, with a wide and practically unlimited public domain, into which they can constantly be crowded. We have driven them to the shore, we have driven them against the base of the mountain, we have surrounded them and penetrated their reservations with our railroads and with our currents of immigration, and the problem is not as it was forty years ago or even as it was ten years ago. We have either got to deal with them now through legislation specially adapted to the present condition of things and adapted to the speedy accomplishment of practical results, and which will give them some chance and some opportunity under the new order of things, or else we have got to submit the whole question to the bloody arbitrament of a frontier war which will result inevitably in the extermination of the Indian race. There is no middle ground, and we cannot experiment much longer.

It was said in the debate yesterday that there are as many Indians to-day on this continent as there were in 1620. While I respectfully beg leave to differ from that statement, at the same time for the sake of what I have to say I am perfectly willing to admit it. Yet there are but a few hundred left of the tribes that once inhabited the New England States. There is not more than that number left of all that once inhabited New York, and Pennsylvania, and Ohio, and Indiana. Everywhere where the white race and the Indian race have come in close contact the Indian has not only given way but he has disappeared from off the face of the earth. As Dr. Holmes said, the race is "provisional" merely. The Delawares, the Shawnees, the Miamis, once powerful tribes in the center of the continent, do not now number one thousand all told; and a similar fate has everywhere overtaken the Indian where he has been pressed by the white man.

Mr. EDMUNDS. He has disappeared by destruction, instead of by absorption, too.

Mr. PLUMB. As the Senator from Vermont well says, he has disappeared by destruction and not by absorption. Absorption is practically impossible. An Indian will maintain his essential characteristics as such as long as he lives; he will never be absorbed into the white race to any considerable extent. It is impossible that he should ever be a factor in any civilization, in any progress, or in any future of this country; but still the obligation of humanity remains, the obligation of law remains, and I would be the last one to advocate the violation of either obligation here or elsewhere. I want to keep all obligations. I know they cannot be kept by building up a Chinese wall around a reservation and seeking to stay that tide which has swollen year by year, and which is a hundred-fold more resistless than the tide which swept the Indians out of the States east of the Mississippi.

It is not a question any longer as to what we would like to do, but it is a question as to what we can do. I may say that while I am willing for the time being that the five civilized tribes shall remain in the Indian Territory under the sanction of the treaties which they ostentatiously bring to our attention every session of Congress—I will say for their benefit that they are simply postponing the time, and that that postponement will not be very long, when they too will have to submit to the fate which has overtaken all other tribes of Indians. They had better take warning from the history of the Indian upon this continent. They had better take warning from the inevitable, and set their houses in order and say, "We will look forward to the time in a not far distant future when we too will be willing to take land in severalty; when we will be willing to sell the remainder of our lands, the lands we cannot use ourselves, to white men who will occupy them, taking the profit to ourselves, and accommodating ourselves to the customs and the laws of the white people and taking up our burden in the race of life along with them and of them."

There is nothing harsh about this at all. The Indians generally upon this continent to-day, if they get the full benefit of the lands they have, will be amply supplied with all that is necessary for life; they will not lack for food; they will not lack for clothing. They have large estates, and while I do not believe that they will make wise use of the lands to any considerable extent that we shall leave to them, still some will be advantaged, all will be given a chance, and the question as to whether any considerable number of them will ever become self-supporting will be finally settled. If we force this bill upon them—if we crowd them out of the tribal relation one result will be crime and pauperism which the adjacent communities will have to bear the burden of. But if we give them a chance as individuals to set up for themselves, what with their own exertions and the proceeds of their lands, which will be sold, they will have means enough, properly applied, to take care of them, so that the Government will not be under the reproach of having crowded them into a condition of pauperism.

I wanted to have the bill amended so that the lands that we are giving so generously to these people might be made use of; if the Indian would not do it that somebody else might, but the Senate thought otherwise. If the bill should pass in the shape in which it now is, I fear that in the effort to carry it out some zealous President or Secretary of the Interior will perhaps lend himself to practices such as heretofore have been applied to obtain treaties with the Indians and thus compel them to adopt the provisions of this law long before they are prepared for it. But if my amendment should be adopted, and if there can be set up in every tribe one or two or fifty or one hundred Indians who will exhibit their capacity to take care of themselves to the remainder of the tribe, and the benefit to be derived from taking land in severalty and having all their affairs separated from those of their fellows, I think the problem will at least have taken a start toward a settlement and a fair settlement both to the Indian and to the Government. I think we shall have begun that which can be said to be the beginning of the end, and that in a few years we shall realize that gradually under the operations of natural causes, by the operation of the ambition of the individual Indian, we shall have inaugurated a policy and a system which will soon take the Indian question out of administration and from legislation, and that system is what I desire. Above all people on this continent, the people now in the West, for themselves and for those who are to come after them, desire a practical settlement of this question. They have got to bear the burden of this contest. They have got to live in the midst of communities of which the Indians form a considerable part. They have got to have the disadvantage of the pauperism and crime, and the association with a degraded and inferior race. They want it settled in a humane way, but also in a practical way. They bear the burdens and their interests should be consulted. Give the Indian his title in fee to the land he can use, evidenced by a patent, and there will be no further agitation about Indian lands. He will be as safe in possession and in title as his white neighbor. There will be an end to all this talk about the covetousness of the frontiersmen for the land of the Indians. Let each Indian choose for himself whether he will throw off the tribal relation, and the tribes will begin to disintegrate, and the example of those who first break off will gradually and beneficially affect the remainder of the tribe.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. President, I shall occupy but a very few minutes. I have made up my mind that it is wise to vote for this bill to divide the land of the Indian reservations in severalty among the Indians, and extend over them the protection of the laws of the States and Territories in which they reside. I understand that the Secretary of the Interior, who has had the Indians in charge in his Department for nearly four years, favors this bill; our Committee on Indian Affairs have matured it and are in favor of passing it. It seems to me that we can wisely pass it and make this experiment.

Surely the condition of the Indians at present is not such as any good man would desire. Their condition could hardly be worse than it is, and if we can do anything to induce even one of these tribes to take their lands in severalty as an experiment, and if, by fairly protecting them by the laws, we shall enable them and they shall be disposed, as I believe some of them certainly would be, to make homes for themselves and engage in cultivating the land and in raising stock, we shall have done that which I hope will have its effect upon other tribes, and we shall have them in a better condition as the experiment shall proceed, and we can amend the law as we find it can be done wisely. I see no good reason why we should not try this experiment.

I am told that for more than forty years there has been no contest, no outrage, no war between the Indian tribes in Canada and the government of that country; and its policy has been to give the Indians lands to cultivate, to encourage them to make homes upon them, to extend the law to them and protect them from that which produces great evils to them and which brings war and great expense upon the Government of the United States.

Mr. TELLER. I desire to ask the Senator from New York a question.

Mr. KERNAN. I do not think I shall be able to answer questions on this Indian matter. I only rose to say that I have listened to the discussion for more than ten days, and I can see no reason why we should not comply with the recommendation of our Secretary of the Interior, who has charge of the Indians generally, and of our committee, who have looked into it, and simply say that we will give them lands in severalty, which they cannot alienate, which cannot be taken from them by judgment, and that we will protect them in their possession as long as they stay there, in the hope and faith that they will begin to build up a different society from that which exists where they roam over the plains and attack the whites at one time and are attacked by the whites at another.

I merely rose to say that with this hope, and in the faith that this bill is in the right direction, we may be able by it to inaugurate a new era; that these Indians whom every man feels are in a wretched condition for them and for us may be improved. I am in favor of the bill and shall vote for it, believing that it is an experiment which we ought to try.

Mr. TELLER. As the Senator from New York declined to yield to me while he was on the floor, I want to say to him now that he is very much mistaken when he says that the Indians in Canada have lands in severalty.

Mr. KERNAN. I said they had progressed there and cultivated the land, as I understand.

Mr. TELLER. The honorable Senator certainly intended the Senate so to understand. The same statement was substantially made here on Saturday. There never was a greater mistake than that. Of course the Indians in Canada have got along much better than they have in the United States; but there are many reasons why they have. The tide of emigration has not swept in that direction; they have not been crowded; there is a great abundance of land in Canada, and cheap land, to be had; but above all things the reason why they have succeeded in Canada is that the government has put them upon a piece of ground and then has recognized it as theirs—not in their individual capacity, but in their tribal relation, and it has not been dealing with them every sixty days as we have been doing with reference to their lands. It has said to them, "that is your home, cultivate your fields there;" and they have cultivated them just as they have in the State of New York on the Indian reservations, where some of them have been cultivating land for the last one hundred years.

Mr. President, it was stated here that the Miamies and the Peorias were exceedingly anxious for land in severalty. In 1854, when this craze—for it was a craze then and it is now—had taken possession of the people, when it was supposed that this was all that was needed to settle the Indian question, the Miamies made a treaty with the Government by which they were to take land in severalty, two hundred acres each, reserving to the tribe 70,000 acres to be held in common. They took their land in severalty; they disposed of it to white people, and would have been paupers to-day but for the fact that they had reserved 70,000 acres in common. In 1873 we made a treaty with them again, and we, then profiting by our experience of 1854, provided that forever the land should be inalienable, and the Miamies to-day cannot part with their title with the consent of anybody or with the approval of anybody. In 1854 their treaty provided that with the consent of the President they might sell their lands. As I say, they took their lands, they then parted with the title, under rules made by the President of the United States, to the white people of that neighborhood, and those who did not accept land in severalty in Kansas, in 1873, or subsequently, went to the Indian Territory and took land in common. It may be that these men who were made paupers by that act are crying for land in severalty now, but I doubt it very much, and it will take a good deal more than the evidence of some agent to make me believe it.

In Canada—and I allude to that because it has been referred to once or twice—the government made a special effort to get the Indians take land in severalty, and it is admitted by those who have given attention to it that the Indians in Canada, with few exceptions, are the most civilized Indians in the world. The highest state of Indian civilization anywhere on this continent is in Canada. The Indians there can hardly be distinguished from white men; in fact they are superior in many ways to the people who first settled that country and to many of the people who claim to be white people and who live in that country; and yet they studiously and sturdily resist all efforts to make them take land in severalty, and that, too, when it is given them on condition that when they become citizens under the law they shall be entitled to all the rights and privileges of citizenship. The land-in-severalty business can find no earthly defense by a reference to Canadian history, and anybody who claims it has not read that history or does not propose that the Senate shall understand the facts. It is so with some other cases which have been cited like the Miamies, and it is said they are here pleading for land in severalty, when in 1873 they abandoned the opportunity to take land in severalty in Kansas, and went to the Indian Territory and took land in common.

The honorable Senator from New York says he wants to give them a chance to make homes. Why, the best homes the Indians have on this continent are where they own the land in common, and, as was said by the gentleman from Alabama this morning, it is not only a question as to Indians holding land in common, but it is a great economic question to-day whether the true principle is not land in common instead of land in severalty. It is a very doubtful question whether the Anglo-Saxon idea of a partition of the face of the earth has been of value to the world; whether the true principle is not that a man who wants to work a piece of land shall work it and he shall own just so much of his mother earth as he can make useful to himself. I believe myself that that is the true theory of land and land ownership, and I believe it would be better to-day if we could adopt some such principle as that, both for white men and for Indians. I do not believe that with land in severalty come all the blessings of home. Homes equally as valuable and as interesting can be made upon land where the title is in common, provided you secure to the possessor while he sees fit to occupy it all the rights he would have if he had a fee-simple title; and when he is done with it, it will go to his children, if they see fit to occupy it, and if he does not have any, it will go to some other person in the community who may desire to make a home upon it. I presume it is fair to say that a good portion of the face of the earth to-day is held in that way, and there are a great many people in this country and in Europe who are crying for land for the landless, because a few men have been enabled by a system of legislation in accordance with this to appropriate vast regions of the land and to keep other people from it except as they pay tribute to them. And that will be the case with these Indians in time; they will be without an acre of land. As it has been in the history of these allotments, so it will be in the future. For twenty-five years, by this bill, they cannot sell the lands allotted to them. What is twenty-five years? You are legislating not for to-day alone, but for the future. In 1854 it was thought that these Indians would be civilized in twenty-five years. Twenty-five years have passed, and they are not civilized yet, and they are not the owners of the land that we gave them in 1854 and the years following. I say now when you have given these Indians the land under this bill and with this present notion, five years will see every Indian in the country with his land and with his patent, and thirty years from that time will see every Indian in the country, with rare exceptions, a vagabond on the face of the earth.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ALLISON in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. PLUMB.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to strike out from the amendment the last clause or sentence, beginning with the word "such."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The words proposed to be stricken out by the Senator from Vermont will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Such allotment of lands shall dissolve the tribal relation of such Indian or Indians, but shall not impair their proper proportionate right to the lands, funds, or other property of such tribe remaining undistributed, which said proportion shall be paid them on the final distribution of the funds and property of said tribe, except as to annuities in money or in kind, which shall be paid as though the tribal relation had not been dissolved.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The thing that I wish to get at in the motion that I make is to get rid of the part of the amendment which makes the allotment to a single Indian against the consent of the tribe provided for in the section by its two-thirds vote for it a dissolution of the tribe. I am inclined to think that it might be wise to invest the President with the power, in a tribe that would not as a tribe consent to break up and take up allotments, to assign land to individual Indians that had got so far advanced in the ideas of civilization that they wished to take one hundred and sixty acres of land and own it themselves although their fellow-Indians were in common all around them. So I should be glad, I think, to vote for a proposition which would authorize the President in his discretion, to allow individual Indians of a tribe that would not consent to break up and dissolve, and take allotments all together, the chance of taking their one hundred and sixty acres and settling down upon it and ceasing to be members of the tribe. Therefore it is that I move to strike out this last clause which declares that in the case of this allotment to separate and to individual Indians the tribal relation shall be broken up. I wish that out in order to leave it a provision that the President, in his discretion, may allot, on the application of individual Indians in a tribe that is not yet willing to break up as a whole, lands in severalty.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ROLLINS in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. PLUMB.]

Mr. PLUMB. I am not tenacious about that part in regard to the relation of the Indian to his tribe after he shall have taken land in severalty. Of course, if the tribal relation is not dissolved by that or by any other act, there is no necessity for that portion of the amendment which provides that the Indian shall have his proportion of annuities, and so forth, because he would have those any way. At the suggestion of a member of the committee I will modify my amendment to correspond with the suggestion of the Senator from Vermont.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Kansas is modified.

Mr. COKE. I am authorized by several members of the committee who are around me to say that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas, modified as suggested by the Senator from Vermont, is acceptable to the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas as modified.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be read as it now stands.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of section 9 it is proposed to add:

Provided, That the President may, in his discretion, make allotments of land in severalty as hereinbefore provided to any one or more Indian members of a tribe or band upon the request of such Indian or Indians, irrespective of the action of such tribe or band; and when allotment of land shall be made to any Indian, the head of a family, allotment shall be made to the members of such family, as hereinbefore provided, in cases where division is made among the members of an entire tribe or band.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As it strikes me, I think that is perfectly right and it would be of benefit to the Indians and to the public interest of the whites, as it might provide for a gradual approach to civilization one by one. At the same time the amendment as it now stands may possibly require some further provision in respect of this new allotment under this proviso being subject to the other provisions of the act about alienation and so on. Very likely it might have that effect now; I am not sure about it; I only call the attention of the committee to it. Further in relation to the individual share that an Indian who had thus separated himself from his tribe in respect of possession, might have and ought to have in regard to annuities and other things that are due to the tribe, may require provision, so that he shall not lose whatever share he might still be entitled to in the property of the tribe beyond the value of the land that had thus been separately assigned to him. I refer to that in order that the committee may consider whether provision ought not to be made in these respects if this amendment is adopted.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I merely want to suggest the difficulty in the way of the whole matter. It is that, though the general policy is to give land in severalty to the Indians who are disposed to change from their tribal character to an agricultural people, it will yet never do to give these Indians the right to dissolve their tribal relation and then set them up on farms of their own within the Indian reservation without the tribe consenting to it. No Indian will dare do it. Whatever he might raise, the hunters of that tribe would steal from him, and they would murder him probably. I would not object on general principles if you allowed him to select his land outside of the reservation of his tribe; but no Indian will dare to set up a farm within the reservation of his tribe without the consent of the tribe.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Well, Mr. President, if that be true, then this section will never be acted upon. I think that where Indians are upon a reservation as a tribe, if some one of those Indians wishes to take whatever risk there is and the President thinks the circumstances are such that he ought to be allowed to do it, the laws of the United States are sufficiently powerful, executed by the whole power of the United States in its executive department, to vindicate his possession to his little one hundred and sixty acres where he raises his corn and other things and his cattle. And I should go for a provision with pleasure, I think—I reserve the right to change my mind if on discussion some insuperable objection should be made to it—which should make any Indian who violated that man's personal rights in respect of his separate farm the subject of the civil laws of the United States or of the State, as the case might be. I am not now on the question which authority ought to vindicate it; and therefore if any Indian or Indians made a raid upon his farm and carried off his cattle, instead of Indian fashion taking a tomahawk and getting revenge he should invite the marshal of the United States or the sheriff of the State of Kansas, if it were in Kansas, to resort to due process of law, by taking the Indians who committed that wrong against him before a civil tribunal and punishing them.

I think that that would be a good coercion of Indians toward civilization. It would make them feel that they must respect personal and private rights. If any Indian is willing to take his one hundred and sixty acres in severalty and be a pioneer in that stage of progress that they must come to, I am willing to give him leave to do so.

Mr. MORGAN. Let me remind the Senator that by this bill these Indians, as soon as they get patents to their lands, are made subject to all the laws, civil and criminal, of the State or Territory in which they are found.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not know how that was; and in what I said I did not mean to go into the question as to which jurisdiction—assuming that we have the power to settle the jurisdiction—the Indian should be referred to; but my point was that if the Indian took his land in severalty although the tribe did not wish to break up, some law, either State or national, should vindicate his private rights.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] as modified.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which on Saturday the Senate adopted the proviso offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] inserting in the sixth section, sixth line, after the word "residue," the words:

Provided, That no Indian shall be punished for polygamy who, at the time of such allotment, was practicing the same in accordance with the usage or custom of the tribe to which he belonged.

Mr. President, I think every lawyer in the Senate will agree on reflection that that amendment, with the after vote which the Senate has just taken retaining the clause permitting two-thirds of the tribe to decide whether this law shall apply to them, ought not to be kept in the bill. It is unworthy of the United States to hold out such a promise to Indians in this bill. The remainder of the bill reads, first, that two-thirds of any tribe may determine whether the tribe shall come under the operation of this bill as to several allotments, with the exception that has been made by the vote just taken. Then it provides that the Indians who avail themselves of these privileges and receive allotments shall be subject to the laws of the State or Territory where they dwell. Now, the provision that no Indian shall be punished for polygamy who at the time of such allotment was practicing the same in accordance with the usage and custom of his tribe, every lawyer must agree, is clearly void. Either the whole bill must be held to be void on the ground that that is illegal, or that provision must be held void as repugnant to the bill. It is not possible that we can pass a statute under which A may be indicted for polygamy, and B may practice polygamy next door and plead the statute of the United States in defense. I do not suppose any lawyer in the Senate would for a moment question the utter illegality of that provision.

If that be true, what follows? It follows that you say to these Indian tribes when you ask for their two-thirds vote, or say to the individual Indian when he considers whether he will avail himself of the provision just adopted on motion of the Senator from Kansas, "You are to be entitled to retain your existing family ties unbroken to which you are religiously attached, to which you are bound in honor and bound by the ties of family affection to adhere; the rights of these women as your wives, accrued under the polygamous system in which you and they were originally numbered, are to be secured;" and the moment the Indian with that promise in the bill accepts it or the Indian tribe with that promise in the bill accepts it, the State law comes down upon him with an indictment, or his white neighbor who is scandalized by the neighborhood of such a family comes down on him with a complaint before a magistrate, and the promise of the United States is utterly nugatory and illegal and unconstitutional, and the courts say, "this clause, being repugnant to the provision that you shall be subject to the laws of the State or Territory, is void."

I am quite sure that the honorable Senator from Texas, when he accepted this amendment, had no idea that it was to place in the bill a promise, and a promise on a matter of this importance to these Indians which would be a delusion and a snare. Of course I know that——

Mr. COKE. The Senator will excuse me for a moment. The amendment was read, and I asked the Senator from Colorado if it was intended——

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will pardon me. I had in my mind in the next sentence I was about to utter that very point. The Senator from Texas, when this amendment was proposed, put this question:

I understand that for polygamous practices in accordance with the laws and customs of the tribes occurring anterior to the date of the allotments there is no punishment under this amendment.

Mr. TELLER. That is it.

Mr. COKE. With that understanding, I see no objection.

The Senator from Texas understood that this was to guard the Indian against any possible retroactive punishment for a previous or existing polygamous practice.

Mr. COKE. Exactly.

Mr. HOAR. It was with that understanding that the Senate inserted this clause in the bill. But now turn to the amendment:

Provided, That no Indian shall be punished for polygamy—

That is, ever punished, as long as he lives, for polygamy—who, at the time of allotment, was practicing the same in accordance with the usage or custom of the tribe to which he belonged.

That is a very different thing from what the Senator from Texas manifestly supposed when he put the question and heard the answer to it. Now, however opposed in principle every Senator may be to tolerating polygamy as an institution, no Senator would deny that it would be an injustice and an outrage to punish the head of an Indian family for polygamy or to compel him in middle life or in old age to put away women who had lived with him to middle life and old age under the laws of the tribe to which he belonged; and if they did, no Senator certainly would think it fit to make a promise to the Indian of impunity for such continuance in polygamy which promise was illegal and delusive.

Mr. BLAIR. I should like to call the Senator's attention to the language of the amendment extending the laws of Kansas to portions of the Indian Territory. He will find it on page 1028 of the RECORD; and the language only extends "the laws of the State of Kansas regulating the descent, alienation, partition, and distribution of real estate."

Mr. HOAR. I understand that; but there is another clause in the bill, in section 5, which the Senator will find is still retained in the original bill, that when this allotment is accepted by any Indian or tribe then such Indian or tribe shall be subject to all the laws, civil and criminal, of the State or Territory where he dwells.

Mr. TELLER. I introduced this amendment, but perhaps it is not as well worded as it might be. I introduced it for the purpose of protecting the Indians, and I think myself, on looking at it, it needs a little amendment. But there is a necessity for some such provision in this bill, unless you propose to get the Indians into trouble. I think that is the effect of the bill, although I will not say that is the intention; but it will be bad enough with even that saving clause. A great number of these Indians have more than one wife, and the more enterprising they are the more wives they have.

They regard the having of several wives as an evidence of their prowess and their power. So whenever an Indian is particularly successful, either in stealing ponies from the whites or the red men, or in hunting, he takes a wife, and then if he has a little better luck he takes another, and so you may say that the headmen in most of the tribes have more than one wife. This bill provides that the moment they accept this land in severalty they become amenable to the laws of the State or Territory wherein they reside. There is not a wild Indian living who understands that he is committing a crime by having more than one wife. They do not think even when they say "now we will be subject to the laws of the white man" that they are going to make themselves amenable for that. And yet if they continue to practice polygamy they will be guilty under some section of the statute of every State, either of having more than one wife or of living in improper intercourse with a woman. It was in the interest of the Indian that I offered the amendment. If we have not the power to do this at all, that is a very substantial objection against the bill in my judgment.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will pardon me. If he leaves out this clause the Indian knows or has the means of knowing when he accepts the bill whether his wives can be saved or not.

Mr. TELLER. Theoretically he will know it; practically he will not know anything about it. Suppose that in the State of Colorado the Ute Indians are put upon their lands—they have acted very badly; the people are very much prejudiced against them—suppose that one of the leading Indians has three or four wives; there is the greatest temptation in the world for the people out there who do not want them there to have him indicted and compel those Indians to remove, because putting them in jail, sending them to the penitentiary, and harassing them by suits would compel them probably to abandon that section and hunt up another somewhere in the wilds of the mountains.

I believe we have the power to keep this shield about the Indians; and if we see fit to withdraw it, it seems to me we may withdraw just as much of it as we choose, but if there can be any doubt about it—I think there cannot be—if I should add after the word "Indian" the words "not being a citizen of the State," I think there could be no question but that the Government could do it. I do not offer the amendment to get the Indians into trouble. I offer it in perfect good faith to protect them in their rights, protect them in a system that to them is not a crime.

Mr. HOAR. Suppose the Indian be a citizen of Colorado, can the United States legally make this exception from the State law?

Mr. TELLER. Of course they can, but if he is a citizen of Colorado, what is the use of that provision that he shall be amenable to the Colorado law? That is already the law; he is already liable to be punished if he is a citizen of Colorado. If there is no objection I ask leave to amend my amendment by inserting after the word "Indian" the words "not being a citizen of the State." I think that will cover it.

Mr. HOAR. My difficulty, if the Senator from Colorado will pardon me, goes to the substance of the provision, and whether the rejection of the Senator's amendment ought not to reject the other provision of the bill is a separate question. I am inclined to think it should, but the Senate thinks otherwise very clearly, as the discussion has shown. But how a statute of the United States can make any human being, whether citizen, or alien, or permanent resident, or sojourner, amenable to a State law and then say there shall be, however, a certain defense to particular criminal law of that State in certain facts which we prescribe, is the insuperable difficulty, it seems to me.

Mr. TELLER. It seems to me perfectly clear that if we have the right to say whether they shall be amenable to the law or not, we may say to what law they shall be amenable, and when we say to all the State laws with a certain exception, that is clear enough. Now I think that the Indians who afterward marry more than one wife ought to be within the provisions of the State law, but I do not think those who have more than one wife now should be subject to those provisions. I have some doubt whether I ought not to amend it, and if there is no objection I will amend it, and then if the Senator thinks it should be stricken out, be it so.

Mr. HOAR. Let it be reconsidered first.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It can be done by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts moves a reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment of the Senator from Colorado was agreed to on Saturday. The question is on the motion to reconsider.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment as originally offered.

Mr. TELLER. Now I ask leave to add after the word "Indian" the words "not being a citizen of a State." I suppose nobody will object to my offering that.

Mr. COKE. I suggest to the Senator from Colorado that the Senate has voted down an amendment declaring the Indians citizens.

Mr. TELLER. But they may be citizens by some other law. Now, I should like to have the amendment read as it will stand if amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That no Indian not being a citizen of a State shall be punished for polygamy who at the time of such allotment was practicing the same in accordance with the usage or custom of the Indians in the tribe to which he belonged.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to inquire of the Senator from Colorado whether he regards the act as reported by the committee as conferring citizenship in the States on Indians on the allotment of the land.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator put the question again? I did not catch it.

Mr. MORGAN. I wish to know whether he considers the act as reported by the committee and acted upon by the Senate as conferring upon an Indian citizenship in a State whenever he accepts a patent for his land.

Mr. TELLER. I did not so construe it. I thought that the condition of the Indian was a very peculiar one; that he would neither be a citizen of the State nor a member of the tribe.

Mr. MORGAN. The amendment of the Senator refers to the fact of an Indian becoming a citizen of a State.

Mr. TELLER. I did not know but that under some other statute he might be a citizen. There are some Indians in some sections that are citizens of the State by special statute, but I do not understand that this bill makes them so. So I say that any Indian not being a citizen of the State, that is, a citizen by some other act and not by this, shall not be punished, &c.

Mr. HOAR. Let me add a word in further response to the inquiry of the Senator from Alabama. When the amendment which I moved the other day to declare these Indians to have become citizens was under discussion, the amendment being advocated on the ground that it was unjust to subject these persons to all the laws civil and criminal of the State without giving them in their turn the right to avail themselves of all the rights of citizens of the State, that the present bill made them defendants and not plaintiffs, the answer was made by the Senator from Texas and the Senator from Missouri, I think, that of course these Indians had all the rights that persons had; that nobody would deny that they were persons, and as such could avail themselves of a recourse to the Federal tribunals. Since that debate my attention has been called to the fact that the counsel for the Department of the Interior in the case of Standing Bear and Big Snake, the application for habeas corpus before Judge Dundy, made an argument five hours long to establish the proposition that the Indians were not persons within the meaning of the United States Constitution and laws, and were not entitled to make application for the writ of habeas corpus in the Federal courts. It is true that Judge Dundy overruled that argument and declared that they were entitled to the writ. Then the Indian agent in the document which was commented on this morning makes this recommendation, to which I call the attention of the honorable Senator from Missouri:

> I would respectfully recommend that they be detained as prisoners at Fort Reno until the tribe has recovered from the demoralizing effects of the decision recently made by the United States district court in Nebraska in the case of Standing Bear.

In other words, the agent of the Department recommends to his superior that a lot of Indians be held in perpetual custody until their tribe has recovered from the demoralizing effects of—what? Of a statement by a judge of the United States district court that an Indian was a person! Then General Sherman goes on to say:

> The release under writ of habeas corpus of the Poncas in Nebraska does not apply to any other than that specific case.

Mr. ALLISON. Will not the Senator from Massachusetts state further that those Indians were released at Fort Reno?

Mr. HOAR. They were.

Mr. ALLISON. And there I want to call his attention to the fact that the Interior Department disclaimed wholly the argument made by counsel.

Mr. HOAR. Where and when?

Mr. ALLISON. They have disclaimed the argument made by the counsel and refused to entertain the idea of an appeal from Judge Dundy's decision. I only want the whole fact to be stated.

Mr. HOAR. Perhaps that is the whole fact, and perhaps it is not. Undoubtedly what the Senator from Iowa states is the fact as he believes; but my point is this: the Senate declined to add to a provision that the Indian might be punished for crime after he had got his land in severalty; you are endeavoring to stimulate him to practice the virtues and the economies of civilized life; and the Senate declined to add to an enactment that he might be sued civilly and criminally; that he might be indicted; that he might be rendered subject to complaint by his white neighbor with or without cause; a provision that he might have the right on his part to defend himself in the same way by suing his white neighbor, by making complaint, by invoking the criminal and civil protection of the law for the property which you confer on him, on the ground that nobody could deny that an Indian was a person, and as such, had such rights already as to the laws of the United States.

Now, it appears that the counsel of the Interior Department argued for five hours that he was not a person. It appears also that without any reproof whatever the agent of that Department recommends the imprisoning of other persons until the tribe shall recover from what he calls the demoralizing effect of such a decision of the district judge, and that the General of the Army distinctly informs all his subordinates by his letter addressed to General Sheridan, the officer commanding that military district, that this decision of the district judge must be understood to have no effect beyond liberating the individual Indian to whom it applied. The inference, therefore, is unmistakable and irresistible that General Sherman instructs General Sheridan to proceed on the theory that in regard to every other Indian that law is denied.

I am not quite sure that the Senator from Iowa is right in his understanding that the Secretary of the Interior has disclaimed the action of the counsel whom he employed. I do not find such disclaimer in any public document or in any authentic form anywhere. What I do know is that the friends of the Indian or persons at whose instigation that writ of habeas corpus was sued out, and who desired to have the right established which the Senator from Missouri believed no man would be hardy enough to question, urged upon the Department that an appeal should be taken and that case carried to the Supreme Court of the United States, in order that the highest legal tribunal in the country might settle this right once for all when the matter was so near the doors of that tribunal, and the Department of the Interior refused.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not wish to interfere with this debate, nor can I lay my hand at this moment upon the document or paper or statement of the Secretary of the Interior, but I think if the Senator from Massachusetts will look at a recent book called "A Century of Dishonor," he will find in that book a published letter of the Secretary of the Interior, in which he states in distinct terms that he did not consent to the appeal of the case decided by Judge Dundy, because upon an examination of the argument of the counsel who argued the case before Judge Dundy he could not assent to the statement and argument made by the counsel who appeared for the United States.

Mr. HOAR. I hope that the honorable Senator from Iowa will derive as much light from the remainder of that book as he has from the passage to which he refers; but whether he be or be not correct in the statement which he now makes or in the original statement, he will agree with me is entirely immaterial. Certainly, if an able counsel, a counsel learned enough in the law, of character and standing enough in his profession to be employed by the Government of the United States in so grave a case, maintained such a thesis as that; and if the General of the Army denies to an Indian the character of a person even to the extent of denying that an Indian is so far a person as to have the right which applies to every person, the right to have the cause of his illegal imprisonment inquired into by a court; and if a subordinate of the Interior Department, without reproof, recommends to his superior officer to keep his prisoners in custody until the demoralizing effect of such an assertion by a single judge has passed by, my friend from Iowa will not claim that the right is sufficiently protected by the mere disclaimer of a Secretary of the Interior, whose term of office is now within five weeks of its termination, in a private letter or a public letter, or wherever else that disclaimer may be found.

My point is, not to make an attack, not to make a criticism of the official conduct of anybody; but if my friend from Iowa will recall my original statement in which he interposed he will see that that is the case. My opinion is that it is an outrage on these Indians to pass this bill in this shape. I do not care how much value there may be in the general policy; I do not care how much thought may have been given to the details of its provisions by the members of the Indian Committee; I do not care how much they may be, as undoubtedly they are, my superiors, not only in general ability, but in special knowledge of this particular subject. I know enough of human right to be sure that it is not just to any class of men, and that no attempt to civilize any class of men can succeed which places them among their white neighbors the subjects of all the punishments and all the harassments for which law can be invoked by the rich against the poor and by the strong against the weak, and which denies them on their part the protection of the law when they seek to invoke it. Does my friend from Iowa question this proposition? Has anybody questioned it? No man questions it. The only answer to it is that the Indian is protected in these rights by the fact that no man in this country will be hardy enough at least, whether he be a citizen or no citizen, to deny that he is a person. That is the answer; that is the only answer which has been made in this debate, and the only reason which has been assigned by the committee or any member of the Senate for refusing to adopt the amendment which I offered the other day, and now when I point out that the General of your armies, the head of the Department to which many men desire to give the custody of all these Indians, instructs his most illustrious living subordinate, General Sheriden, that this doctrine is not true, when the agent of the Indian Office dealing with one of these tribes demands their imprisonment until the demoralizing effect of this doctrine, which the Senator from Missouri says no man is hardy enough to deny, has passed by, I submit respectfully but confidently that this bill does not hold out to these Indians and that the general provisions of the law do not without question extend to these Indians the protection they must have and which they specially need if this experiment is to be successful in any degree.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Several SENATORS. Let us have a vote.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I appeal to the Senator from Pennsylvania to allow an order to be entered, that this bill, with the amendments already adopted, be printed, so that we can see it to-morrow?

Mr. WALLACE. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And with the amendments printed in italics, so that we can see where they come in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont asks that the bill and amendments be printed for the use of the Senate. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

The Senator from Colorado asks unanimous consent to modify the original amendment submitted by him. Is there objection?

Mr. HOAR. That leaves it pending?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That leaves it pending. The Chair hears no objection, and the amendment is thus modified. The question now recurs upon the amendment as modified.

Mr. WALLACE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania to yield to me a moment; I will renew his motion if he wishes me to do so.

Mr. WALLACE. I yield the floor to the Senator from Iowa to reply to the Senator from Massachusetts, and will then claim it to press my motion to adjourn.

Mr. TELLER. I ask leave to introduce an amendment to be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received and printed.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I do not seek the floor to reply to the Senator from Massachusetts. I have not mingled in this debate, and if I understand the amendment alluded to by the Senator from Massachusetts as offered by him, I was in favor of it; and if this bill as it stands to-day has the legal effect stated by the Senator from Massachusetts, I will stand with him and vote against it. It would be a manifest injustice to subject these Indians to the laws, criminal and civil, of the several States without allowing them to go into the courts and protect their rights of life, liberty, and property. I trust the Committee on Indian Affairs is not, and that no member of it is willing to impose upon the Senate such a bill as that.

I interrupted the Senator from Massachusetts simply to call his attention to two statements which he had then made in connection with the particular fact to which he was alluding. I did not controvert his general propositions, and do not now do so; but in the statement he made he stated that the Indian agent had requested that the Indians within the jurisdiction of the military authorities at Fort Reno should be held at Fort Reno until the demoralization of the tribe caused by Judge Dundy's decision had ceased. I call his attention to the fact that although the Indian agent did do that thing, the War Department and the Interior Department in concurrence immediately released those Indians with two exceptions.

I called his attention further to the fact that it was within my knowledge that the Secretary of the Interior disclaimed the argument made by the counsel for the United States at Omaha in Judge Dundy's court, whereby it was argued that Indians were not persons within the meaning of the Constitution and laws of the United States.

I thought these two statements ought to go hand in hand with the statement that the subordinates of the Indian Department had been guilty of this——

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Iowa allow me to ask him a question, as he is more familiar with the history of this particular transaction than I am? I do it not for the sake of imputing anything to anybody. I desire to have this Ponca business repaired if I can with reference to the honor of the United States, and not to bring dishonor or discredit on any individual or officer. But I desire to ask the Senator, as he seems to be so familiar with the facts, whether it is not true that after this decision of Judge Dundy the persons who had contributed to obtain this legal opinion from the district court, and who were specially friendly to the Indians as they conceived, (though perhaps not really more so than other people,) were eager and endeavored to induce the Secretary of the Interior to have an appeal taken in order that the Supreme Court of the United States might settle that question?

Mr. ALLISON. I believe that is a true statement of the case. The Interior Department did not prosecute an appeal because, as I understand, the decision of Judge Dundy was in accord with the views and sentiments of these very people.

Mr. DAWES. But the Interior Department knew very well that that decision had no force except in the district where it was rendered, unless it was sanctioned by a judgment of the Supreme Court; and if the Interior Department did not approve of the argument against that decision in the district court, it was not concluded from presenting any other reasons there might exist in the Supreme Court either way.

Mr. ALLISON. But my friend from Massachusetts will remember now that I am not criticising this matter one way or the other.

Mr. DAWES. What are you doing?

Mr. ALLISON. I am simply calling the attention of the Senator's colleague to one statement which I thought ought to go with another statement he was making. So far as the Ponca question is concerned, I have some knowledge of it, and I have some opinions with reference to it, but I shall wait until the proper time to express my opinions on that subject. I will only say now in a general way, that the Ponca question has been a difficult question since 1874, in my judgment, and I believe the Interior Department has to the best of its ability, and with a desire to promote the true interests of the Ponca, dealt with that question. I may be mistaken, but that is my belief, and I will endeavor at some time to state more at length the reasons why I believe it. In the mean time I only wish to put on record the statement I have made in reference to the particular matters of which the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] was speaking.

Mr. WALLACE. Now, I renew my motion to adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at four o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

have authorized me to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass. They deem the information asked for of great importance looking to the interest of our own country in the adoption of a right policy upon the question of the remonetization of silver and its restoration to its full debt-paying power.

The resolution was adopted.

The SPEAKER. If there be any other committee having a resolution of inquiry to report the Chair will be glad to recognize it at this time.

ENCROACHMENTS OF WHITES ON INDIANS.

Mr. DE LA MATYER. I ask, by unanimous consent, to present the petition of 32,000 citizens of the United States, praying that such steps shall be taken as will prevent the encroachment of white settlers on Indian reservations, and that the treaties with the Indians be faithfully executed. I ask that the memorial letter accompanying that petition be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and the petition and memorial letter were received, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

The memorial letter is as follows:

MEMORIAL LETTER ACCOMPANYING THE INDIAN PETITION OF 1881.

To the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

The men and women of this nation herewith present their second petition to your honorable body for the faithful fulfillment of treaties and other guarantees given by our Government to the different tribes of Indians within our borders. Your petitioners do not suggest any political policy to be pursued, leaving such matters to wise statesmanship. They come with but one thought, conviction, prayer. The thought recognizes the moral obligation of nations, as of individuals, to keep compacts. The conviction is that recognized moral obligation should result in the fulfillment of such obligation. The prayer is for such fulfillment as being ever, we believe, the highest political wisdom, the truest national safety.

An objection has been made by some to treaty-keeping with Indians, on the ground that the Indian tribes among us were never "nations," and that therefore so-called "treaties" with them were never real treaties. Your petitioners with deep feeling recall the fact that our Government has for a hundred years recognized these tribes as "nations," in its hundreds of compacts with them calling the latter "treaties," and has, by acts of Congress, bound itself faithfully to observe all such made in the past, though deciding to make no new treaties with Indians. Your petitioners therefore pray, for the sake of national honor, which demands honest dealing with all men, that the terms "nation" and "treaty" may be kept to the heart as they have hitherto been made and explained to the ear.

Again, it has been urged that the law of eminent domain nullifies these treaties, and requires our Government to take legal jurisdiction of Indian lands; to divide the same in severalty, and to open the remainder for white settlement. Your petitioners are deeply impressed that for any government to apply the law of eminent domain to the property of others than its own citizens, is to necessitate, if there be resistance, a war of conquest, a measure wholly opposed to the fundamental principles of this Government, and that Indians, with few exceptions, are not citizens of the United States, but are under their own legislative and executive authority, as in the Indian Territory, and this by the terms of our sales of territory to them, and of their titles to the same.

Your petitioners therefore present their memorial to your honorable body, feeling that the plea for treaty-keeping is a protest against any enactment of Congress which would extend legal jurisdiction over territory not under the control of this Government, and which would do this, as for example the Oklahoma bill proposes, contrary to explicit treaty stipulations.

Finally, your petitioners would express the earnest conviction that the nation which has spent $500,000,000 on Indian wars growing out of the violation of treaties can best afford to make it to the interest of the Indian tribes among us voluntarily to become citizens of the United States, and not by the coercion of acts of our Congress.

Our petition of last year was from fifteen States; that of the present year represents every State of the Union and several of the Territories, and has many more than double the number of last year's signatures. The work of circulating the petition and accompanying pamphlets has been done by few persons, and chiefly by Christian women, already busy in benevolent work; yet the roll contains the names of people of all occupations and in all ranks of society; of great business firms and manufacturers; of distinguished men and officials; of judges, governors, and embassadors to foreign courts; of authors and editors; of the faculties and students of not a few of our most noted collegiate and theological institutions, and of literary and art associations. Besides all these, the roll includes the signatures of women's mission boards, Christian associations, and other benevolent societies; the names of pastors and bishops of the churches; also the records of the indorsement of a rising vote from various church meetings of different denominations; of meetings held specially to consider the Indian question; of ministers' unions in different towns and cities, and of various other bodies. All these and many other evidences reveal the fact that the moral sentiment of those classes who largely make and control public opinion already requires governmental faithfulness to our Indian treaties. For this your petitioners most earnestly and respectfully pray.

PHILADELPHIA, January, 1881.

Mr. DE LA MATYR. I have a few remarks which I will not detain the House with at this time, but merely ask they be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

Mr. DE LA MATYR. Mr. Speaker, if I were permitted to blot from our history a single dark chapter, I would not select that one which contains the record of African slavery, the responsibility of which rests not on the South alone but upon the whole nation, although no man deprecates that great crime against humanity more than I do. Neither would I choose that of the civil war, which was God's just judgment for that crime, and which drenched our land in fraternal blood and left a heritage of hate that divides and weakens and endangers the nation that, judging from the heated debate on this floor but yesterday, will not be permitted to subside for a generation yet. But, sir, I would blot out the shameful record of the contact of our civilization with the aborigines of the country; I would extinguish the line of border warfare, black with nameless atrocities, which from the first settlement of the country has slowly moved westward until entangled amid the mazes of the mountains separating the great plains from the Pacific, where it lingers like the storm-clouds of heaven in detached masses of blackness, ever and anon bursting forth in scenes of horror which startle and shock public sentiment, but which has been repeated until that sentiment has become hardened and severe. And, sir, if I could annihilate but one paragraph of that darkest chapter of our national life I would choose the recent treatment of the Ponca tribe, the aggravated atrocities of which have awakened sensibility in the seared conscience of the nation.

Sir, had the wise, humane, Christian policy inaugurated by the founder of the Commonwealth which you in part represent, and which made the name of William Penn "as precious ointment poured forth," been adopted and sustained by the National Government, this chapter which makes humanity blush had not been written.

It is time, sir, to call a halt, and make our dealings with the remnants of once powerful tribes conform to our boasted ideas of right by granting the request of these petitions.

STEAMSHIP DESSOUG.

Mr. REAGAN. I move, Mr. Speaker, by unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the joint resolution (S. R. No. 143) authorizing the inspection and issue of an American register to the Egyptian steamship Dessoug, and I will send to the Clerk's desk to be read a letter which will fully explain the necessity for its immediate passage.

Mr. COFFROTH. Where is that joint resolution?

The SPEAKER. On the Speaker's table.

Mr. COFFROTH. Then I must object to it.

Mr. REAGAN. Allow me to say this is the steamship which brought over, under Lieutenant Gorringe, the Egyptian obelisk, and there is a petition from merchants and ship-owners two yards long asking for its passage.

The SPEAKER. The subject is not before the House, objection having been made.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BAILEY. I ask, Mr. Speaker, by unanimous consent that the Committee on Pacific Railroads be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4874) in relation to the Utah and Northern Railway Company, and it be taken up for action at this time.

Mr. REAGAN. Did anybody object to my joint resolution being taken up?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COFFROTH] made objection to it.

Mr. COFFROTH. And I objected because I wish to go to the Speaker's table to dispose of the business there in its order.

Mr. FINLEY. I demand the regular order of business.

Mr. FIELD. I rise to claim the floor on a question of the highest privilege effecting the rights of certain members to their seats on this floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize this as interrupting the morning hour for the call of committees.

Mr. BAILEY. I understand the gentleman withdraws his objection to my proposition.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will try to recognize the gentleman later in the day.

Mr. COBB. I move to dispense with the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The only thing which can interrupt a contested-election case is the question of consideration.

Mr. COBB. My desire is to proceed to the consideration of the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

Mr. FIELD. This will only take a few minutes and there will be no discussion upon it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised by the gentleman from Massachusetts that the consideration of these Iowa cases will not require any time beyond a statement to the House in the form of resolutions from the committee and that there will be no debate thereon.

Mr. COBB. I do not insist on my motion.

Mr. COX. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Did I understand the Chair to decide the other day on a question of privilege like this, concerning the right of a member to his seat, that the question of consideration could not be raised as to the apportionment bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair never decided that question. The Chair did decide that he was bound to recognize a member from the Committee on Elections who rose to call up a case touching the right of a member to his seat on this floor, but never denied the right of the House to test its sense whether it would proceed to the consideration of the case by raising the question of consideration. That was a matter, the Chair held, to be decided by the House itself. The Chair now recognizes the gentleman in his right to make the motion to proceed to the consideration of these cases.

Mr. COX. Then I ask the Chair if the question of consideration between the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts in reference to these election cases and the gentleman from Indiana is pending?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Massachusetts because he rose to a question of the highest privilege. The question of consideration being raised, if the House determines not to consider the election cases then the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Indiana who moves to dispense with the morning hour for the call of committees, to dispense with which requires a two-thirds vote.

Mr. COX. I desire to say, then, that I will not antagonize the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts or the bill which is proposed to be considered by my friend from Indiana; but I give notice that to-morrow morning, with the consent of the House, I hope to bring up the apportionment bill as against all measures, and will ask its consideration at that time.

Mr. FRYE. Before proceeding to the consideration of these election cases, I desire to introduce a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

Mr. SPRINGER. And I wish to introduce some bills for reference, as I happened to be absent when my State was called.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman after the disposal of the present cases.

Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Indiana to raise the question of consideration?

Mr. COBB. I will withdraw the question of consideration, with the express understanding that I be heard on this District appropriation bill immediately after the disposition of the contested-election cases.

IOWA CONTESTED-ELECTION CASES.

Mr. FIELD. I now call up the Iowa contested-election case of Holmes vs. Sapp.

The SPEAKER. The resolutions reported from the Committee on Elections will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the petitioner, J. C. Holmes, in the matter of his petition asking to be admitted to a seat in the Forty-sixth Congress as a Representative from the eighth congressional district of the State of Iowa, have leave to withdraw his petition.

Mr. FIELD. I am advised, Mr. Speaker, that no member of the Committee on Elections desires to speak on this matter. If any other gentleman wishes to ask any questions in reference to it, or desires to be heard for a limited time, I will yield for that purpose. The gentleman from Indiana, a member of the Committee on Elections, desires, I am informed, to print some remarks in connection with it.

Mr. COLERICK. It was my intention to have asked to be heard on the questions involved in this case. One of the questions presented by the report of the Committee on Elections is of vital importance and its determination may establish a precedent vicious and dangerous in its character. But being impressed with the belief that at this late stage of the session the question cannot receive that consideration which its great importance demands, and that the time of the House can be more profitably spent in the consideration of matters of perhaps greater importance, I will merely ask leave to print in the RECORD the remarks that I intended to make.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly. [See Appendix.]

Mr. FIELD. The resolution which has been read is, in substance, agreed to by all the members of the Committee on Elections, with the exception of one, and without going through the formality of calling the previous question, as I think there can be no discussion upon it, I will simply ask that there be a vote taken upon the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question will be taken upon the resolution which has just been read.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. FIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. FIELD. I now call up the contested-election case of Wilson against Carpenter.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the petitioner, John J. Wilson, in the matter of his petition asking to be admitted to a seat in the Forty-sixth Congress as a Representative from the ninth congressional district of the State of Iowa, have leave to withdraw his petition.

Mr. FIELD. This case is in all essential particulars exactly like the other, and I ask a vote upon it.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. FIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DAILY HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. FRYE. I desire now, Mr. Speaker, to make a report from the Committee on Rules, in reference to the daily hour of assembling of the House. I report, by direction of the committee, a substitute for the resolution which was referred to the committee.

The SPEAKER. The substitute will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, That its daily sessions hereafter for the Forty-sixth Congress shall open at eleven o'clock a. m.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. FRYE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GENERAL INDEX OF JOURNALS OF CONGRESS.

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a report from the Committee on Rules in reference to the general index of the Journals of Congress, and merely ask that it be printed in the usual form and laid upon the tables of members, and also that it be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly. It is as follows:

The Committee on Rules, who were instructed by resolutions passed June 18, 1878, to provide for the preparation of a general index of the Journals of Congress, submit the following report of the progress that has been made in the work:

The last report made by the committee (H. R. Report No. 1776, second session, Forty-sixth Congress) submitted the complete index of the Journals of the first ten Congresses.

Since that report was made the indexer has completed the index of the Journals of three more Congresses, which brings the work down to the year 1815. The committee are gratified to report this rapid progress, for the reason that the character of the work and its importance are now so fully developed that its completion in the best possible manner and in the shortest possible time have become objects that deserve earnest attention.

Although the publication of the index of the Journals of the first ten Congresses was only preliminary, and made chiefly for the purpose of subjecting the plan of the work to the test of practical use, the committee have been much encouraged by the favorable comments on it that have been received from various sources. As an indication of the estimation in which the work is held, we quote the following, in addition to communications referred to by us in previous reports:

"It will be of great use to the Library."—Boston Public Library.

"It promises to be of very great value in tracing out the history of the operations of the Government."—Smithsonian Institution.

"It evidences an exact and comprehensive method, intelligence, and common sense."—Brooklyn Library.

"It will have great value to all concerned in the study of public affairs."—Benjamin Vaughan Abbott.

"It is a great work for the country."—Philadelphia Press.

"It well deserves the attentive consideration of all who are interested in indexing, or in the prospect of having a key to unlock the official stores of American legislative history."—New York Tribune.

Such commendations as these confirm the wisdom of the House in authorizing the work and all that the committee have in previous reports urged as to its value.

We have no special recommendations to make at this time. We would, however, urge upon members of Congress that they make a careful examination of the index contained in the last report of the committee (H. R. Report No. 1776, second session, Forty-sixth Congress) and of the plans for it as detailed in our previous reports, (H. R. Report No. 52, third session, Forty-fifth Congress and H. R. Report No. 23, second session, Forty-sixth Congress,) in order that the work may have the benefit of their criticisms and suggestions in its further prosecution.

ARSENAL AT BENICIA, CALIFORNIA.

Mr. BERRY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 7095) to create a manufacturing arsenal at Benicia, California; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

UNITED STATES POSTAL TELEGRAPH COMPANY.

Mr. SPRINGER. By request, I introduce a bill for reference, the same as was introduced in the Senate on Friday last by the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. KIRKWOOD.]

The bill (H. R. No. 7096) to aid the United States Postal Telegraph Company in the construction and operation of postal telegraph lines was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

POSTAL TELEGRAPHS, ETC.

Mr. SPRINGER also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 7097) to provide for the appraisement of the telegraph lines, property, and effects of companies acting under the provisions of the act of July 24, 1866, entitled "An act to aid in the construction of telegraph lines, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," and to secure information concerning postal telegraphs in other countries; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

REPORT OF UNITED STATES ENTOMOLOGICAL COMMISSION.

Mr. VALENTINE introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 387) authorizing the printing of 30,000 copies of the third report of the United States entomological commission; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Printing, and ordered to be printed.

EGYPTIAN STEAMER DESSOUG.

Mr. REAGAN. The objection to the consideration of the Senate joint resolution relative to the Egyptian steamer Dessoug has now been withdrawn. It is the joint resolution (S. No. 143) authorizing the inspection and issue of an American register to the Egyptian steamship Dessoug. I ask that it be taken from the Speaker's table and put upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

A MEMBER. Let it be read.

The joint resolution was read. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to issue an American register to the steamship Dessoug, of Egyptian nationality, but of American ownership, and restricts the inspection of her machinery and hull by the inspectors of steam-vessels simply to the inquiry as to their safety for the conveyance of passengers, without reference to the mode or place of their construction, and provides for the issue of a special certificate of inspection for said steamship.

Mr. CHALMERS objected, but subsequently withdrew his objection.

Mr. REAGAN. I send to the desk a letter from the Secretary of State. To save time, if gentlemen do not desire to have it read, I will have it printed in the RECORD as part of my remarks. I will only say further that the Committee on Commerce of the House have had before them a copy of the Senate resolution and have unanimously approved it and recommend its passage.

The letter of the Secretary of State is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, January 5, 1881.

SIR: I have the honor to bring to your attention, and through your committee to that of the House of Representatives, the eminent propriety of procuring the passage of an act granting an American register to the steamer Dessoug, purchased by Lieutenant-Commander Henry H. Gorringe, of the United States Navy, and employed by him in the successful transportation of the obelisk, known as Cleopatra's needle, from Alexandria, Egypt, to New York.

The circumstances under which the obelisk was presented by the Government of Egypt to the city of New York are doubtless so familiar that I need merely advert to the brilliant service rendered by Lieutenant-Commander Gorringe, involving the assumption of considerable personal risk on his part, and notably so in the purchase and alteration of a sea-going steamer for the transportation of the monolith. The sentiment of national pride naturally felt in this successful achievement, coupled with the international character of Mr. Gorringe's service, makes it fitting that some appreciative action should be taken by Congress in the premises, and in no way could this be more appropriately done than by permanently identifying the vessel in question with the country and flag to which she has rendered so signal a service.

I am informed that the prominent merchants and ship-owners of New York are in favor of some such recognition of what Lieutenant-Commander Gorringe has done in behalf of their city, and that the course suggested would not be opposed by any conflicting ship-building interests.

The accompanying draught of a bill has been prepared as suitable to the desired end, subject to the consideration and approval of your committee, to which I earnestly commend it.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

WM. M. EVARTS.

HON. JOHN H. REAGAN,
Chairman Committee on Commerce, House of Representatives.

The joint resolution was taken from the Speaker's table, read three times, and passed.

Mr. REAGAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

UTAH AND NORTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. BAILEY. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4874) in relation to the Utah and Northern Railway Company, and that it be put upon its passage.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 1 of the act entitled "An act granting the right of way through the public lands to the Utah Northern Railroad Company," approved March 3, 1873, be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out of the said section, after the words, "and through Montana Territory," the following words: "to a connection with the Northern Pacific Railroad."

SEC. 2. That the act entitled "An act creating the Utah and Northern Railway Company a corporation in the Territories of Utah, Idaho, and Montana, and granting the right of way to said company through the public lands," approved June 20, 1878, be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding thereto the following section:

"SEC. 4. And the said company is hereby authorized and empowered to construct such branch or branches of its said road in said Territories of Utah, Idaho, and Montana, or either of them, as it may deem advisable, with the same grants, powers, rights, and privileges, and upon the same terms and conditions as are provided for its main line; and Congress may at any time add to, alter, or repeal this act."

Mr. BLAND. Is there any grant of land in that bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised there is not.

Mr. BAILEY. It does not involve a dollar of money or an acre of land.

Mr. McLANE. With the permission of the House I will state the only effect of the bill is to relieve the company from the reorganization which would otherwise be necessary. It is by the existing law required to make a connection with the Northern Pacific Railroad. The Northern Pacific has changed its route, and this company can no longer connect with it. It now asks to be permitted to go on in its own right.

Mr. McGINNIS. That is all there is of it.

There being no objection, the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and it was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BAILEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BUSINESS OF DISTRICT COMMITTEE.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am directed by the Committee on Rules to offer the resolution which I send to the desk, and to ask its adoption.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That upon the expiration of the morning hour on Monday, the 14th of February, the Committee on the District of Columbia shall be entitled to the floor for the consideration, during the remainder of that day, of business affecting the District of Columbia as it may be called up by said committee.

Mr. BOUCK. I object.

The SPEAKER. This resolution has reference to the organization and order of business of the House.

Mr. BLACKBURN. When the gentleman from Wisconsin objected I rose to ask the Chair whether the resolution reported from the Committee on Rules is not entitled to consideration in spite of objection. If I may be permitted to make a suggestion I will say it occurs to me this is certainly a privileged report, because if adopted it can have but one effect, and that is to regulate the proceedings of this House in the transaction of its business.

The SPEAKER. It changes in effect the order of business as provided for in the rules.

Mr. STEPHENS. It may be considered an amendment to the rules to that extent.

The SPEAKER. The resolution provides only in regard to one day's session.

Mr. STEPHENS. The resolution is to a certain extent a modification of the rules, and the Committee on Rules have the right to report at any time for consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Rules have always had the right to report at any time as to matters touching the order of procedure of business.

Mr. BLAND. I have no objection to that; but I submit that the Committee on Rules have no right to report a resolution changing the order of business where the matter has not by special order of the House been referred to the committee.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I suggest whether if the resolution be now objected to it will not be the right of the Committee on Rules to call it up after the resolution has lain over for one day.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the right of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BOUCK] to object, and under another rule the resolution being objected to has to lie over for one day.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. COBB. Under instructions from the Committee on Appropriations I desire to report——

A MEMBER. "Regular order!"

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the morning hour.

Mr. COX. I move to dispense with the morning hour.

The motion was agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. COBB. I now report back with amendments from the Committee on Appropriations the bill (H. R. No. 7035) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes, and move that the same be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. McMILLIN. I reserve all points of order on the bill.

The SPEAKER. All points of order will be reserved.

The bill was accordingly referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

APPORTIONMENT UNDER THE TENTH CENSUS.

Mr. COX. I ask consent to have referred to the Committee on Printing, for the convenience of members, the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed, for the use of members of this House, 5,000 additional copies of the pamphlet containing the tables, &c., for the apportionment of the tenth census.

The SPEAKER. As that is merely a duplication of former printing, the Chair does not think it comes under the law requiring a reference to the Committee on Printing, as it will not cost $500.

Mr. COX. Then I ask unanimous consent that it be adopted now.

There was no objection, and the resolution was adopted.

FLOORING OF THE NATIONAL MUSEUM.

Mr. BLACKBURN. With the consent of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. COBB,] I will report from the Committee on Appropriations a bill which should be passed now.

Mr. COBB. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. BLACKBURN, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. No. 7098) making an appropriation for the flooring of the National Museum; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. I ask the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am a trespasser upon the floor myself, with the courtesy of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. COBB.] I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to consider the bill just reported by me from the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. SIMONTON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the bill (H. R. No. 7098) making an appropriation for the flooring of the National Museum. The bill will now be read.

The bill was read, and appropriates the sum of $26,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to place a flooring of marble or encaustic tiles in the large halls of the National Museum building, to be expended according to the plan and under the direction of the building commission of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, under whose supervision the museum has been constructed.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will state that this National Museum building is now about completed, and it is simply a question whether the matter of flooring shall be according to the original plan, of asphalt or concrete, or whether a change should be made in the plan so far as to substitute a marble or tile flooring. The concrete pavement would cost about $9,000. The cost of the encaustic tile or marble pavement will be not to exceed $25,000. I hold in my hand a letter from Professor Baird, which is indorsed unanimously by the Board of Regents, recommending that an appropriation of $26,000 be made for the purpose of flooring the main halls of the National Museum building with marble or tiling. It is indorsed I believe by every member on the Committee on Appropriations. Unless some member desires it, I will not ask to have the letter read.

Mr. HAWLEY. Let it be printed in the RECORD as a part of your remarks.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will make that request.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION,
Washington, December 9, 1880.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that the new National Museum building, for the erection of which Congress appropriated $250,000, has been substantially and satisfactorily completed, with the exception of the floors of the main halls. The original estimate provided for floors of concrete and cement. So many remonstrances, however, have been made against the use of this material instead of marble or tile for the flooring, as not being in accordance with the architectural beauty and design of the building, that at a called meeting of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, on the 8th instant, the subject was considered and the following resolution adopted:

"Resolved, That for the purpose of substituting a marble or tile flooring instead of concrete, as originally designed, for the large halls in the National Museum, an appropriation of $25,000 be requested of Congress, to be expended according to the plans and under the direction of the building commission of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, under whose supervision the museum has been constructed."

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

SPENCER F. BAIRD,
Secretary Smithsonian Institution.

Hon. S. J. RANDALL,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. BLACKBURN. If no one desires to move an amendment to the bill I will move that the committee now rise and report it favorably to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SIMONTON reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 7098) making an appropriation for the flooring of the National Museum, and had directed him to report the same back to the House without amendment and to recommend that it be passed.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it accordingly was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BLACKBURN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REPRINT OF BANKRUPT BILL.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. I ask consent that the bill (H. R. No. 6988) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy be reprinted, as the former print has been exhausted.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. COBB. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the bill (H. R. No. 7035) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government for the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes.

Mr. HUNTON. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HUNTON. If the House shall now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the bill indicated by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. COBB,] will there be any limit to general debate thereon?

The SPEAKER. No motion has been submitted in regard to limiting debate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Pending the motion to go into Committee of the Whole,

Mr. KENNA, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the House of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 6025) to establish an assay office in the city of St. Louis, Missouri; and

A bill (H. R. No. 7029) to provide for a deficiency in the appropriation for interest on the 3-65 loan of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881, and for other purposes.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted for withdrawal of papers in the following cases:

To Mr. LINDSEY, in the case of Jefferson Savage, there being no adverse report; and

To Mr. POEHLER, in the case of C. F. Heers.

COAST SURVEY, ETC.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a report of the expenditures of the Coast and Geodetic Survey for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880; which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department, and ordered to be printed.

OPERATIONS OF PATENT OFFICE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Commissioner of Patents, transmitting a report of the operations of the Patent Office during the year ending December 31, 1880; which was referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

FINES AND DEDUCTIONS FROM PAY OF MAIL CONTRACTORS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Postmaster-General, transmitting a report of fines and deductions from the pay of mail contractors for 1880; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

The question then recurring on the motion of Mr. COBB, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the District of Columbia appropriation bill, it was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. CONVERSE in the chair) and proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 7035) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes.

Mr. COBB. Mr. Chairman, from some intimations that I have heard this morning, I understand there is to be some discussion upon this bill, and I think it would be best perhaps to fix the time such discussion is to occupy before the debate proceeds. If gentlemen who wish to oppose the bill will indicate the time they desire, perhaps we can agree upon the time when we get into the House. I do not care to commence the discussion until the time for general debate has been fixed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that it is not usual to limit the time for general debate until the debate has begun. The Committee of the Whole can rise at any time for the purpose of having the House limit debate.

Mr. HUNTON. I suppose it is not within the power of the Committee of the Whole to limit debate. The House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on this bill without any limitation as to general debate. I desire to occupy myself a little time in the general debate on this bill. I do not know how long, probably not over thirty minutes. Whether any other gentleman wishes to speak in opposition to the bill I know not, but if the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB] will proceed now with his remarks, it will take but very little time, I think, for us to get through with the general debate.

Mr. COBB. The gentleman's statement is satisfactory to me. Mr. Chairman, I have no disposition to enter into a discussion in detail of the provisions of this bill. I want to say, however, to the committee that this is a very important bill, and I think that perhaps members of the House do not give it as careful consideration as they ought. It is a bill providing appropriations to run what is a government in itself, with all the elements, I may say, of a government of much greater proportions, and as members are aware the Government of the United States pays one-half of the amount appropriated in each item of the bill.

The bill is substantially the same as the corresponding bill passed a year ago, except that as to streets and sewers the amount is cut down very considerably below the appropriations then made. The remainder of the bill is mainly the same as the bill of last year. I do not care now to go into any statement of the reasons why the amount for streets is now cut down. I shall do that at some other time if necessary.

We provide in this bill for the construction of four school-houses, one more than we provided for a year ago. We propose to appropriate in a certain way $70,000 more than we appropriated a year ago for school purposes. This additional appropriation grows out of a necessity for a high-school building in this District. There are already intermediate schools: but the demand, as I understand—and I have given the question the best consideration I could—is very great for what may be termed a high school. This bill provides how this building shall be constructed.

There are certain school bonds growing out of an old lottery system which was provided for by law. The money arising from that scheme was converted into bonds, which this bill now proposes to pay off, and devote the proceeds to the erection of a high-school building, the location of which is fixed upon square 446, what is known as "Corcoran Square."

This bill appropriates, as the corresponding bill a year ago did, $100,000 for the construction of two intermediate school-houses in school division No. 2. It then provides for the construction out of this same $100,000, of another building in the county or country. This provision, I may state, meets, as I understand, the entire concurrence of the school board, with whom I have consulted, and I think it is in harmony with the views of the commissioners. I think this provision of the bill, Mr. Chairman, so far as the location of this high school is concerned, meets with the concurrence of the local authorities, and so far as the location of the other two school-houses in school division No. 2 is concerned I believe that also meets with the approval of all the officials of the District of Columbia connected with public school affairs, the District commissioners as well as the school board.

The reason why I now discuss this provision of the bill is from the fact there may be some objection to it, but I shall be brief in what I have to say. It may perhaps seem to some that $170,000 appropriated for the location of school-houses in the District of Columbia is a large sum of money to be appropriated for that purpose. I have, however, already explained how the $70,000 comes. That is a fund which has been fostered as I am informed by the public-school trustees for the very purpose of providing for the erection of this proposed high-school building. The disposal of the bonds and the use of the fund arising therefrom in the erection of this high-school building will save the District of Columbia from the payment of rent for the use of any such building.

As to the two buildings in district No. 2, I wish to say that looking over the District of Columbia carefully and hearing from those who are familiar with this subject, I was clearly of the opinion and I believe the Committee on Appropriations concurred entirely with me in the necessity for making this appropriation. I was clearly of the opinion, and in that the committee agreed with me, that these two school buildings should be located in school division No. 2. The reason for it is this: In that division we have a large number of school-rooms rented, many of which, and I can speak from personal knowledge, as I visited them, are totally unfit, as I conceive, as school-rooms for children.

We are paying high rents for these rooms in many cases; I am informed by those who are competent judges that we are paying rent to the extent of 10 per cent. upon the total value of the property rented. By building these two school-houses we will save nearly $8,000 of rent as soon as they are completed and fit for use. In looking over the whole field, therefore, I found great economy would be secured by the construction of these buildings in that locality.

There is another reason why it should be so, and that is this: that the property in that division is increasing in value. The bill does not require the commissioners to purchase these sites, but permits them to do so in case of necessity. The value of property in that division is increasing, and it is important as a matter of economy to the District that these sites for public schools should be secured at as low a price as possible. To do so the commissioners should have this discretionary power. These are the reasons which actuated the committee in locating these two school buildings in that division.

I think of nothing now I need say further in reference to this bill: but at the proper time and when the question comes up, I will present such facts to the committee as will enable it to judge correctly of the provisions of the bill. If, however, any member of the committee desires at this time to propound any question, I shall be glad to answer.

Mr. HUNTON. Mr. Chairman, I agree with the gentleman from Indiana who reported this bill from the Committee on Appropriations. This is an important question, and should receive the careful consideration of every gentleman composing this Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. It seems to me matters concerning this District are often passed over without that consideration which members ought to give to so important a subject. And, sir, there is nothing more important concerning this District than the appropriation of the taxes raised from the people of the District and contributed by the Federal Government and the manner in which the money thus raised shall be expended. I, sir, as chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, have taken some pains to inform myself upon these subjects, and the information I have obtained leads me to so different results from those embodied in the bill now under consideration that I feel compelled to trespass for a few moments on the time of the committee to explain my views.

I take it for granted that the gentleman from Indiana and the Committee on Appropriations mean to expend the revenues that would be raised by the District of Columbia and that portion which will be drawn from the Federal Treasury for the purposes of the District of Columbia, &c., for the next fiscal year. These revenues, Mr. Chairman, according to the best information which can be obtained, the commissioners of the District estimate at $1,697,000 for the next current fiscal year, and a like amount being drawn from the Federal Treasury under the organic act providing for the government of this District makes the total amount $3,394,000.

Mr. COBB. I should like to inquire of the gentleman from Virginia what estimates he refers to?

Mr. HUNTON. I refer to the estimate furnished me by Major Twining. That estimate to which I have just referred includes $21,000 which will be surplus on hand of the revenues in the present fiscal year. So that for the next current year there will be in the Treasury to be expended the sum of $3,394,000; and the question for this committee to determine is, how shall that sum best be expended for the benefit of the Federal Government and for the government of the District of Columbia?

Now, Mr. Chairman, we are met in the outset of the consideration of this question by what appears to me to be a most remarkable and, if the gentleman from Indiana will excuse me, I will say a most vicious change in the appropriation for this purpose over that made for the present fiscal year. Under the head of "Improvements and repairs and for care and repair of bridges," on page 2 of the bill, the amount appropriated for the replacement of the wooden pavements of this District is reduced from $300,000 for the present fiscal year to $100,000 for the next fiscal year. There are, Mr. Chairman, seventeen miles of rotten wooden pavements in this city. These pavements are rapidly becoming impassable for the vehicles. They are rapidly decaying, and unless they are replaced as speedily as possible not only will it depreciate the value of property along these avenues, but may, and possibly will, spread disease throughout the whole District. So that the first great duty on the part of the Congress of the United States is to enable the District commissioners to replace these worthless, decayed wooden pavements now in existence in this city with some substantial and serviceable substitute. I need not remind the committee that under the management of the old board of public works, once in charge of the improvements in this city, a vast number of the streets were paved with wood. Of this work there still remain seventeen miles of wooden pavements, or the remains of that amount of wooden pavement, which, as I have said, is in a dilapidated and dangerous condition. This pavement has become in some places impassable, is rapidly decaying in all of its parts, and is in such a condition that there is absolutely great danger of its spreading disease throughout the city.

As I have said, sir, the first great duty of the Congress of the United States is to see that these streets are taken up and good, permanent pavements put down in their stead. If the appropriation in this bill for the replacement of these streets is all that Congress will allow for that purpose during the next fiscal year, then Major Twining, the engineer of the District in charge of this work, informs me that it will take six long years to take up the wooden pavements and replace them with rock or concrete. I take it, sir, that this committee will not agree that a work of so important a character, so absolutely necessary to be accomplished as this in a short time, shall be carried on through a long series of years and in so slow a manner as this. The reason why this sum of $300,000 for the present fiscal year is dwarfed to $100,000 is because the Appropriations Committee, at the instance of the gentleman from Indiana, has devoted $170,000 for the purpose of building school-houses.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I will not yield to any other gentleman on this floor in my zeal for education and for the erection of a sufficient number of school-houses for the children of this city; but I do think that it is improper to take the money which should be expended upon the renewal of these streets and appropriate $170,000 of it for the building of school-houses. I need not remind the committee of the fact that last year, I believe, we appropriated money to build three or four school-houses, and the year preceding to build two, and now we not only propose by this bill to devote $170,000 to build three school-houses, but one of these is to be erected at a cost of $100,000.

Mr. COBB. No, $70,000.

Mr. HUNTON. Very well, $70,000.

I fully agree with the gentleman from Indiana that this $70,000 in 3.65 bonds shall be devoted to the purposes of building school-houses in this District; but I am unwilling that any more than the sum of $70,000, embraced in these 3.65 bonds, shall be allowed for that purpose, or be devoted in the present condition of District affairs to the building of school-houses. As I have stated, I believe we built two or three last year and two the year before, and I think that few gentlemen of the committee will not concur with me when I say that we are now building them as rapidly as the people of this District can afford. I agree, as I have stated, that it is important, as rapidly as we may, to build school-houses for the education of the children of this District. But it must be remembered, Mr. Chairman, that there are other important matters to be attended to as well as that, and I, for one, am not willing that $170,000 shall be taken from the renewal of these rotten pavements and applied now to such a purpose. Why can we not go on gradually in the construction of these houses and build one this year, or two now and two next year, and so on until we obtain full accommodation for all the children of the District who go to the public free schools? I trust, sir, that when the time comes the committee will limit the expenditure for the next fiscal year to $70,000 for the purpose of furnishing school buildings for the District of Columbia, which sum I think is ample under the circumstances.

I do not agree with the gentleman from Indiana——

Mr. BUCKNER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HUNTON. Certainly.

Mr. BUCKNER. This $70,000 that the bill appropriates is for a high-school building?

Mr. HUNTON. I am coming to that.

Mr. BUCKNER. That is to be the cost of it.

Mr. HUNTON. Seventy thousand dollars is the amount proposed.

Mr. BUCKNER. What is taught in a high school?

Mr. HUNTON. That is the very point I was coming to. The higher branches of education are taught in it, those which are next to a collegiate education. I was going on to say that I did not concur with the gentleman from Indiana in the policy of erecting or inaugurating a high-school system in this District. I believe it is proper for every government to furnish school facilities for all the children within its borders. I believe that these facilities ought to be equal and offered equally to all classes of its children. But I do not believe that any special privileges should be offered to any.

If this high school is inaugurated, as proposed by the bill, then some hundred or it may be a greater or less number of the children of this District will have afforded to them high-school privileges, while the balance of the children of this District must be content with common-school privileges; and it will make a distinction between the children of this District, which will breed discontent between the poor, who enjoy only the common-school facilities, and those who enjoy the higher school facilities. I believe it is the policy of this Government and of the District of Columbia to afford the best common-school facilities to all, and when a student in one of these common schools desires to pursue the higher branches of education, he ought to do it at his own expense. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I think it is eminently judicious and wise that this high-school feature of the appropriation bill shall be stricken out, and that the $70,000 in the Washington school-fund bonds shall be appropriated to building school-houses for common-school purposes, and that sum of $70,000 will build two most excellent school-houses of the ordinary style having twelve rooms each, furnishing twenty-four additional school-rooms for the accommodation of the children of the District. And I trust that this committee will not take from the amount necessary to carry on rapidly the replacement of the rotten pavements of the District, by appropriating that amount to high-school purposes or any other.

The next provision of this bill to which I call the attention of the committee is on page 4. It is:

For support of the indigent insane in the District of Columbia in the Government Hospital for the insane in said District as provided in sections 4843, 4844, and 4850 of the Revised Statutes, $80,000.

Now, Mr. Chairman, until last year—I am not certain I am right in that—there was no appropriation in the District appropriation bill for the support of the indigent insane in the Government hospital; but it was a Government institution supported by Government contributions alone. Last year the Committee on Appropriations introduced this item into this bill, and after a long conference between the committees of conference of the two Houses, after hearing evidence and having all the parties before them, they fixed upon the sum of $37,000 as the proper sum to be paid by the District of Columbia in this appropriation bill; and that amount was inserted in the last appropriation bill for the District of Columbia. This bill departs from that agreement thus entered into between the two Houses and puts the amount up to the sum of $80,000, which is greatly beyond the share which the District of Columbia ought to pay.

In regard to these asylums and charitable objects, I desire to call the attention of the House to the provision of the organic act, which will be found on page 104 of the Statutes at Large, second session Forty-fifth Congress, volume 20. I need not remind the committee that this act, called the organic act, providing a government for the District of Columbia, provided what should be paid for by the District, and what should be paid for by the Federal Government, and what should be paid for jointly by the District government and the Federal Government. It was provided in this bill that all the appropriations made for the support of the District government should be paid one-half by the Federal Government and the other half by the District government. The commissioners were to estimate what would be necessary for the expenses of the District for each fiscal year at the beginning of each session of Congress, and were to send their estimates to the Secretary of the Treasury. The Secretary of the Treasury was to pass upon those estimates and send them back to the District commissioners and the District commissioners were then to send them to the House. Now, what were they to estimate for under the organic act?

The said commissioners shall submit to the Secretary of the Treasury for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and annually thereafter, for his examination and approval, a statement showing in detail the work proposed to be undertaken by them during the fiscal year next ensuing, and the estimated cost thereof; also the cost of constructing, repairing, and maintaining all bridges authorized by law across the Potomac River within the District of Columbia, and also all other streams in said District.

Now follows the clause to which I desire to call the attention of the committee specially:

The cost of maintaining all public institutions of charity, reformatories, and prisons belonging to or controlled wholly or in part by the District of Columbia, and which are now by law supported wholly or in part by the United States or District of Columbia.

So that the only institutions of charity, reformatories, or prisons which the commissioners for the District had a power to estimate for by law were those "belonging to or controlled wholly or in part by the District of Columbia, and which are now by law supported wholly or in part by the United States or District of Columbia."

So that to bring within this appropriation bill any charitable object or the support of any prison or reform school, or anything of the sort, two things must concur: it must at the date of the act have belonged to or been controlled, wholly or in part, by the District of Columbia, and must have been provided for prior to that time, either wholly or in part, by the United States or the District of Columbia.

Now, I think gentlemen will find upon consulting the statutes that this Government hospital for the insane in the District of Columbia is a Federal institution, not belonging to or controlled wholly or in part by the District of Columbia; and if that be the case, then the commissioners of the District and the Secretary of the Treasury have no right to include it in the estimates of appropriations for the District of Columbia. And I take it neither the gentleman from Indiana nor any other gentleman on the floor of this House can show anywhere in any of the statutes that this was an establishment owned by or controlled either wholly or in part by the District of Columbia at the date of the passage of the act, a clause of which I have just read. If that be the case, Mr. Chairman, it is not within the power of this House, according to the law as it stands, to appropriate anything for the indigent insane in this Government hospital. But if the committee should think otherwise, then, I say, do not raise the appropriation from $37,000, the amount agreed upon in a conference between the two Houses at the last session of Congress, to $80,000, which is greatly beyond what ought to be paid by the District for this purpose under any circumstances.

Then, Mr. Chairman, there is an appropriation in this bill for maintaining the jail, which is not embraced within the organic act at all, and which I believe I can say with some degree of certainty has never been introduced into an appropriation bill of the District of Columbia. Well, now, what is this jail? Does it come within this organic act? Unquestionably not. The jail is a Federal institution regulated entirely by Federal laws, and with its government the District of Columbia has nothing whatever to do.

If gentlemen of the Committee of the Whole will turn to page 121 of the Revised Statutes of the District of Columbia they will find that the jail is entirely under the control of the Federal Government. The District government has no part or lot in controlling or owning the jail in this District. Unless it is embraced in the terms of the organic act, the appropriation for its support cannot properly be embraced in the bill making appropriations for the support of the government for the District of Columbia.

I call attention to these things to show that the Committee on Appropriations depart from the law when they undertake to make the District of Columbia pay its part for the support of the indigent insane in the Government hospital and for the support and maintenance of the prisoners in the Government jail.

I beg leave to state to the Committee of the Whole that the committee of which I have the honor to be the chairman has considered all these questions with some care, and I believe I am speaking the sentiments of the members of that committee.

The next thing that attracted my attention in looking over this bill is the total abolition of the special assessment division in the District government. I beg leave to say that in the opinion of the commissioners for this District that division is absolutely necessary and should be retained. I call attention to the following communication from the chief of that division:

OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONERS DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
SPECIAL ASSESSMENT DIVISION,
Washington, January 28, 1881.

GENTLEMEN: In compliance with your instructions, I have the honor to make the following report:

The revision of the assessments on streets and avenues has been completed, but a large amount of work remains to be done before the office can be closed.

There are one hundred and sixty-six alley assessments in a state of partial revision.

The claims for revision filed in 1878, 1879, and 1880 are not yet all examined and reported upon.

Lien certificates have yet to be prepared and issued upon one hundred and sixty-six streets, and also the one hundred and sixty-six alley assessments.

The accounts of Mr. George W. Beall, late clerk in charge of the collections on account of special assessments, since 1871 to July last, should be reconciled with the books of the treasurer of the board of public works and the commissioner of the sinking fund.

The old records in this office are valuable, and should be properly cared for and filed; and the current work is by no means insignificant, and covers every conceivable form of complaint.

The appropriation for the current year is:

|---|---|
| One clerk | $1,800 |
| One clerk | 1,400 |
| One clerk | 1,000 |
| Contingent expenses | 100 |
| Total | 4,300 |

And I request that at least the same appropriation may be made for the year ending June 30, 1882.

Very respectfully,

WM. OSCAR ROOME,
Chief of Special Assessment Division.

To the honorable COMMISSIONERS DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

It will be seen that according to the report of the chief of that division, there is now work enough, and more than enough, to maintain the force in that office for the next fiscal year, and not until after the next fiscal year, at the earliest, can any reduction be made in that office. There is work constantly going on there, and it is necessary that the office be continued for the good government of this District.

The Committee on Appropriations propose to abolish in the attorney's office, for the District, one assistant attorney. I have here a memorandum from the district attorney showing that that officer is absolutely necessary. He states that—

> The last annual report, covering nine pages, ending with June, 1880, shows that thirty-six civil cases were disposed of in the higher courts; forty-two were tried in the criminal court, on appeal by the defendants from the police courts. For the same time over three thousand cases were tried by the special assistant in the police court.
> There were then left pending two hundred and thirty-six civil cases in the court of record, and one hundred and forty-five appealed cases in the criminal court. This does not cover cases tried before justices of the peace.
> Written opinions in eighty-two cases, covering two hundred and thirty-three pages, were delivered, and nearly as many cases were disposed of by opinions indorsed on the papers. No reference is made to consultations with the commissioners, letters written, &c.
> During this period I was quite constantly before the House District Committee for over four weeks.

This assistant district attorney which the Committee on Appropriations proposes to abolish is the assistant district attorney who appears before the police court; and this report from the District commissioners says that over three thousand cases were disposed of in that police court during the time covered by this report. Unless there be a district attorney to appear before the police court of the District of Columbia it is impossible that the other two, the district attorney and his assistant, can appear before that court. Therefore, in the opinion of the commissioners, in the opinion of the district attorney, and in my opinion, it is necessary to preserve what has existed for several years past, the district attorney and two assistants.

The Committee on Appropriations propose to abolish the messenger in that office, a proposition that is proper enough, perhaps. But they also propose to put in here an appropriation for inspector of gas and gas meters, $3,000. I do not see why that should be charged to the District of Columbia. It is for the inspection of gas manufactured by the gas companies in the city of Washington, and it seems to me that, if there be any expense about it, it should be borne by the gas companies themselves. I believe it has never before been put upon the District.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. Do I understand the gentleman to say that, in regard to these various items, he is speaking for the Committee for the District of Columbia, or is he giving merely his own opinions?

Mr. HUNTON. I state what I believe to be the sentiments of the committee.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. I do not think the gentleman does that, at least in some respects.

Mr. HUNTON. Very likely. I do not say that I speak the views and sentiments of all the members of the committee.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Illinois. The committee has never taken any action upon these subjects.

Mr. HUNTON. I believe I speak the views of the majority of the committee.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. That belief has not been shown by any action of the committee.

Mr. HUNTON. This bill has been carefully considered by the subcommittee of the District of Columbia, and I certainly speak their sentiments.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Illinois. It has never been before the full committee.

Mr. HUNTON. That is true. I come now to the appropriation for streets. This bill has reduced the appropriation for work and repairs on streets, avenues, and alleys from $70,000 to $20,000; on account of repairing lateral sewers from $30,000 to $20,000; and for cleaning alleys from $8,000 to $6,000; and they propose to reduce the appropriation for repairs on county roads—I believe I am right in that—from $20,000 to $10,000.

Now, I am informed by the engineer commissioner for the District, who has the work specially in charge by the organic law to which I have referred, that if these reductions are made the sewers in this city will go to decay; the streets will run to waste and become to some extent impassable, and the county roads cannot be kept in repair for the sum here proposed, $10,000.

I believe I am correct when I say that there are nearly one hundred miles of county roads in the District of Columbia. Some of these roads around the city are used as public drives. They must be kept in good order for the convenience of those visiting the parks around the city. In order to keep them in repair, to prevent them from washing into gullies and becoming impassable, there must be more than $10,000 appropriated by the Congress of the United States.

In the health department one inspector is abolished, although, as I am informed by the health officer of the District, it is impossible to do the duty of that office with less than the present force. There have been for some years two food inspectors in the District. This bill proposes to reduce the number to one. It is impossible, as I am informed by the health officer, that the necessary duties in connection with the inspection of food in the large extent of territory under the supervision of the health officer can be performed by one food inspector. We all know how important it is that the food which goes into consumption of the people should be pure and wholesome. I am informed that this object cannot be secured if we undertake to dispense with one of these food inspectors.

This bill also reduces the salary of the pound-master from $1,200 to $1,000. During the last session, by the action of the committee, sustained by the two Houses of Congress, the salary of this officer was raised from $1,000 to $1,200; and this increase was made because the pound-master in the performance of his duties is obliged to keep a horse and buggy in order to go about the District. I submit the salary should be continued at the present figure. The contingent fund of the health department is also cut down nearly one thousand dollars. It is important that this fund should remain as it was last year.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is what is called the Linthicum loan; that is, $40,000 loaned by the Linthicum estate to the District of Columbia. That loan is bearing 6 per cent. interest. The persons having charge of the estate are not asking repayment; they prefer that the loan should not be repaid at present. This bill provides for the repayment of that $40,000. It strikes me that at present we had better not pay back the $40,000, but continue to pay its interest for a year or so longer until the streets of this city have been put into passable and healthy condition.

These are some (and only some) of the objections that I make to the bill reported by the gentleman from Indiana. I beg that the Committee of the Whole, as we pass upon the bill, item by item, will pay particular attention to it; and I hope that the gentleman from Indiana will agree that the appropriation for replacing wooden pavements may be passed over when we first reach it, so that we may determine when we have gone through the bill how much may be appropriated to the improvement of streets. I take it that the gentleman from Indiana, like the rest of us, is willing to appropriate to the streets whatever may be left of the revenue of the next fiscal year after providing for other needs of the District. In order to do this I shall ask him when we reach that item of appropriation to consent that it be passed over, to be returned to after we shall have gone through the bill. I have nothing further to say now.

Mr. COBB. Mr. Chairman, if no other member of the Committee of the Whole desires to say anything, I shall occupy a moment in replying to one or two remarks made by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTON.]

With regard to the improvement of streets and sewers, I desire to say that I am in favor of doing all that may be reasonably necessary for that purpose; and I think I can show the committee that in this bill we have provided ample funds for the purpose of supplying such demands. Does the gentleman from Virginia know the fact that there is in the Treasury to-day $419,000 unexpended of the amount we appropriated last year?

Mr. HUNTON. For streets?

Mr. COBB. For streets and sewers.

Mr. HUNTON. We only appropriated $300,000 for that purpose.

Mr. COBB. I have here a letter from Mr. Lawrence, the First Comptroller of the Treasury, stating the amount of District appropriations remaining unexpended. We appropriated about five hundred thousand dollars for this purpose last year, of which $419,000 is to-day on hand, with not exceeding two months and a half in which to spend it. Now, I say (and I think the Committee of the Whole will bear me out in the position) that it is not right to be appropriating money that is unexpended in this way.

Mr. HUNTON. The gentleman has appealed to me and asked me whether I know what he states to be the fact. I know very well that of the $300,000 appropriated last year to replace the wooden pavements there is a considerable balance in the Treasury to-day; but I also know, if Major Twining is to be believed (and I have yet to hear any man question his veracity) that at the end of the present fiscal year there will be not a dollar of that appropriation in the public Treasury. The gentleman forgets that the commissioners have until the 1st of July to expend the appropriations for the present fiscal year——

Mr. COBB. I stated that a moment ago.

Mr. HUNTON. And not a dollar will remain in the Treasury at the end of the fiscal year.

Mr. COBB. I appeal to members of this committee as practical men when I say that considering the time the commissioners will have in which to expend this money, it will be impossible for them under ordinary circumstances, without doing extraordinary work and employing an extraordinary number of men, to spend this $419,000. To spend $130,000 it took them from the 1st of last July to the setting in of cold weather. Now, after the weather gets so that the work upon streets can be resumed, the commissioners I say will have only about two months and a half in which to spend this $419,000.

I maintain, therefore, that in this bill we have given all that is necessary for this purpose. On New York avenue, for instance, we give every dollar that Major Twining asks—$7,000. Last year we gave $100,000 for the New York avenue sewer; and we now propose to make only a small appropriation, because more than $200,000 already appropriated to that purpose is now in the Treasury. In regard to that question, I do not wish to discuss it further. I think it is bad policy for the Government to appropriate money unused in the Treasury. I say we ought to begin to square our accounts in this District, and begin to understand how the money is used. I do say there is no man under the sun to-day who can tell exactly how matters in this District stand. We make appropriation and the money is used and I can say to gentlemen that money was put on the streets a year ago not in the schedule and not provided by law—thousands of dollars of it. We ought to be careful when we appropriate money not to appropriate too much. We ought to appropriate enough, and then see that it is expended as it was intended when the appropriation was made.

We give $153,000 in this bill for streets, as the gentleman from Virginia himself admits. We give for common roads more than $20,000. I know they want $70,000 for the roads in this District. From the examination I have made, I know the roads here are good ones. I have never traveled over a bad road in this District, and I have traveled here over one or two of the best macadamized roads in the country.

Again, the gentleman says I have dropped the assistant attorney. That is true. It was done after a careful examination of the question. It has been done with the full concurrence of the Treasury Department. Gentlemen will find it in the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury inclosing the estimates.

The gentleman from Virginia further says we ought not to expend this large sum of money for public schools. I will say to the gentleman there is a public-school system adopted in this District. I found it here when I came upon the Appropriations Committee. The Committee on Appropriations found it as a system already in existence and operation. If we were to adopt a system, we might differ in some respects from the system which now prevails in this District, but it is a system upon which hundreds of thousands of dollars have been expended in school buildings.

Some say the schools are too large. I do not controvert that; but I do not propose to break through the existing system, and the system does require a high-school building, and a high school such as we have in the Western States, such as my people feel prouder of than anything beneath the sun, where, under our public-school system, every town has a high school where the children can be educated. Under this school system the people cease to be paupers. There are in this District 21,000 paupers, more than 10 per cent. of the entire population. They need schools here, therefore, to educate and elevate the people so as to get rid of these paupers. It needs this education for the purpose of teaching them industry. Educate them and send them out into the world, so they will not become paupers.

I did not understand, however, the gentleman from Virginia would oppose the provision in the bill for the building of public schools, but he does object to paying a debt of $70,000 in bonds. Now, sir, these bonds are payable; they are due, so to speak; and I say at a time like this, when we can pay these bonds, it is our duty to do it, especially when the debt is increasing in this District as it is.

According to the gentleman's own calculation, if we appropriate the sum of money this bill provides for, we will not, next year, have a dollar left. It will take every dollar of the revenues of the District to pay the debt. Does the gentleman know we passed a bill the other day for the payment of $162,000 of interest which has just fallen due?

Mr. HUNTON. I will answer the gentleman. I do know it, and I know after paying that $162,000 there will be $21,000 of surplus in the Treasury at the end of the present fiscal year after all the appropriations for this year have been expended.

Mr. COBB. That may be. But I ask whether that is not a very small margin to act on when we take into consideration an expenditure of $3,500,000? Is it not too small for us to take any risk?

I trust the gentleman from Virginia does not want this District to increase its public debt, when to-day it hangs like a mill-stone around the necks of the tax-paying people, the plain and poor people of this District. Their property has almost been confiscated. We pay to-day out of the revenues of this District $750,000 in interest. That the people pay, and in addition the Government of the United States pays $750,000. It makes $1,500,000 in all, and that interest is gradually increasing. Next year it will be greater than $1,500,000, and yet the gentleman admits we will come within $20,000 under this bill of expending the entire revenues of the District.

I understand Congress has settled the policy in regard to this District. I think it is an equitable one, equitable so far as the people of the District are concerned surely, and they cannot complain. It is that the Government of the United States pays fifty cents of each dollar that is expended in the way of appropriation for the running of this District. That, I say, I believe to be equitable so far as the people of the District are concerned. I did not vote for the bill, I am frank to say, when it was before Congress. Many other members did not do it because they believed the burden on the whole country was too great and that it would produce extravagance in the management of District affairs. But, sir, that has been settled.

Now, in regard to the question of the jail. The gentleman says we have no right to appropriate out of the District funds for the maintenance of the jail. Does the gentleman and every one here know that the inmates of that jail are persons who have committed violations of the law and jurisdiction of the District? They are as much District criminals as any confined in jails in any of the States are criminals against the jurisdiction of those States.

Mr. HUNTON. Will not the gentleman allow me to state that he is not meeting my point at all? My point is——

Mr. COBB. I do not desire to be interrupted. If the gentleman has a question to ask, I will answer him.

Mr. HUNTON. Will the gentleman allow me to state my position?

Mr. COBB. Very well.

Mr. HUNTON. The point that I made was that under the organic act, which I quoted, the District jail, or the jail of the District, is not one of the objects provided for in that organic act to be estimated and appropriated for by Congress. Now, if the gentleman from Indiana will address himself to the organic act and show me that the jail is included in any language of that act which will authorize it to be placed in an appropriation or brings it within that provision, then I am answered, and not otherwise.

Mr. COBB. I have examined the act, and in my judgment it does.

Mr. HUNTON. How?

Mr. COBB. That is the judgment of the Comptroller of the Treasury, and it is the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. HUNTON. I ask the gentleman how?

Mr. COBB. Because it is a District institution and nothing else.

Mr. HUNTON. Now, I beg leave to call the attention of the gentleman from Indiana to the language of the organic act.

Mr. COBB. There is not a prisoner in that jail to-day who is not a prisoner placed there for a violation of the laws within the jurisdiction of the District of Columbia, and the gentleman from Virginia will not deny that.

Mr. HUNTON. I will answer that, sir. I will ask the gentleman if there is a prisoner in jail anywhere in the United States, from any district or from any judicial district in the United States presided over by a United States district judge, a prisoner who has been put in there from the district, the expense of which is paid by that district? They are paid out of the general fund of the United States; and the court of this district is just such a court as I have referred to.

But I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Indiana to the language of the organic act:

> The cost of maintaining all public institutions or charities, reformatories, and prisons belonging to and controlled wholly or in part by the District of Columbia, and which are now by law supported wholly or in part by the United States or the District of Columbia.

Now, this jail does not belong to and is not controlled wholly or in part by the District of Columbia, and the District of Columbia never, until now, has appropriated for its maintenance as I am informed.

Mr. COBB. Well, I can say this to the gentleman from Virginia: the committee has passed upon that section and put its construction upon it already in a District appropriation bill a year ago. He insisted then, for the very same reason that he insists now, that the jail ought not to be appropriated for in this bill, that the persons sent from the District of Columbia and confined in the insane asylum should not be paid for out of the District money. Why? Because he says the District officials, strictly speaking, have no right to control that institution. And yet we have been paying for this purpose and it is the law that we should pay it. We paid last year the sum of $37,000 for that purpose, a larger sum being appropriated originally in the bill, which I believe was reduced by the gentleman's motion here, and I understand him to be in favor of throwing everything upon the United States Government that he can, so as to relieve the District of Columbia of all possible expense.

Mr. HUNTON. The gentleman has forgotten the fact that this item was reduced by a conference committee between the two Houses.

Mr. COBB. Very well.

Mr. HUNTON. It was reduced from $80,000 to $37,000 after a full consideration of the subject and examination of witnesses.

Mr. COBB. I will say to the gentleman from Virginia, in justice to him, that I do not speak except from my own recollection, not having examined the record. But my belief was that the gentleman himself moved to reduce it. Whether his motion carried or not I will not be certain.

Mr. HUNTON. I think that is very likely.

Mr. COBB. Very well. Now, as to this provision for the jail. This jail is within the jurisdiction of the District of Columbia and is provided for the admission of prisoners from the District of Columbia alone. I understand under the general law to which the gentleman refers in relation to the District prisoners who are guilty of criminal offenses against the United States are sent to this jail just as they are in the districts to which he refers. They are sent to Albany or elsewhere, and it does not cost the Government of the United States anything except for their transportation. When they are placed in that institution or any of these institutions provided for that purpose, the Government pays nothing whatever for their support while staying there. The Nashville prison in Tennessee, is preparing, I understand, to take prisoners from the United States in the same way. That is free of charge. All the Government of the United States has to do for a district is simply to send the prisoners to one of these free institutions, where they are kept without any cost to the Government. These institutions take the prisoners and hire them out and make money out of them in that way. But, at all events, the Government is at no expense for their support.

Now, this jail is provided for in this bill. It is put in because it is to all intents and purposes and in spirit and effect a District institution as much as any institution that the gentleman can mention, whether it be a church or a school-house or any other building in the District. I examined that question. I looked into it minutely. I found that institution, in my judgment, extravagantly run. I found that there were twenty watchmen receiving annual salaries of about twelve hundred dollars each. I found the officers getting good pay. I found that it cost just $60,000 in round numbers to run it, and I had to call the superintendent of that jail before me before I could ascertain the amount that was paid to any one of these persons, for there was nothing on the record to show it. I was unable to find any document that indicated to me what was paid to these men, and had to take testimony to get at the facts. I called him before me to give an account as to officers and watchmen and assistants and the amount that they were getting.

I found this state of things, and I acted according to the best judgment I could bring to bear on the subject. I cut them down about ten thousand dollars, and I think this committee will believe when they have heard the facts upon that question, which I do not propose to go into now, that I have done full justice to that institution. It gets nearly fifty thousand dollars. It admits on the average about four hundred. It has been getting $60,000 heretofore. So long as it was on the hands of the Government of the United States and supported by the Government of the United States alone, there was no complaint; but when it comes to the District, where it ought to come, then we look into the matter as we ought to do and as we have done.

The gentleman has referred to the District-attorney question, and I will speak of that a moment. The Secretary of the Treasury agrees with me about that. If I am wrong about it, after my investigation, then it will be for the committee and the House to make the correction. The second assistant District attorney, we believe, is not necessary. He is an unnecessary appendage to the attorney's office. I know the attorney for the District has printed a brief at public expense, at your expense and mine, and sent it to every member in an envelope, arguing that it is necessary for him to have this second assistant attorney to assist him. I do not think such an officer is required. In this matter I proceed on the information furnished me by the Treasury Department, which scrutinizes these things very carefully. It is there I go to get my facts, and that is the only place where I can get them; and, in my judgment, I get the facts there correctly. They appear to be frank and open and anxious to give information and advice, and they do it. And I have found in every particular, from the examination I have made, that they know what they are doing.

Now, with regard to the insane asylum, I have a word to say about that. This bill contains—and I speak of this item because the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] thinks it ought not to be included in the bill—this bill contains $80,000 of an appropriation to pay for the support of indigent insane of the District in the Government Hospital for the Insane. These indigent insane are sent there directly under the law. The reference to the law defining the classes of persons that should be sent from the District and elsewhere to that institution is repeated in this bill in order to call the attention of the officers of the asylum to the law, and thereby give them notice that they ought to follow it. It was put in the last appropriation bill, and is here repeated. That law provides that the District shall pay for its patients sent there; and now they have got over three hundred in that institution. Dr. Godding, the superintendent of the asylum, in his report, which is before me, puts the actual cost of the patients sent by the District authorities to that asylum at $89,000. Some gentlemen thought that was too much. I feared that perhaps Dr. Godding might be a little extravagant, and as he was under the control mainly of the Government of the United States, I did not feel disposed, if there be any extravagance in that institution, to impose it on the District of Columbia. I brought the amount down $9,000 for that reason, leaving it $80,000 instead of $89,000 as recommended by Dr. Godding in his report. We appropriated $37,000 in that last bill, which was less than one-half what was recommended then.

Mr. HUNTON. I wish the gentleman from Indiana to state to this House as a lawyer whether under the terms of the organic act either the Government Asylum for the Insane or the jail is included in the estimates to be made by the commissioners.

Mr. COBB. I think it is. After the examination I have made, I do think so.

Mr. HUNTON. Does the gentleman think either is embraced within the language of the organic act?

Mr. COBB. Yes, sir; it is embraced within the language and the spirit of the law.

Mr. HUNTON. Let me read the law again.

Mr. COBB. The gentleman need not read it again. He has read it twice, and I have read it.

Mr. HUNTON. I ask the gentleman whether the jail was ever "belonging to or controlled wholly or in part by the District of Columbia?"

Mr. COBB. It never was.

Mr. HUNTON. Then it is not embraced within the law.

Mr. COBB. That is one construction.

Mr. HUNTON. It is the very language of the law; it is not a construction.

Mr. COBB. I know the gentleman from Virginia and the law officers differ as to that. I would not have put this in the bill, I will say very frankly to the committee, if it had not been recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury, and also personally to me by the Comptroller and others. But for that, I perhaps would not have put it in. But I see the equity and justice of it. It is as much the duty of Congress to put the jail in this bill and provide for it as to provide for the payment of the commissioners or any other officers in the District, because it is solely a District affair. District criminals go there, and they alone. And why should not the District pay half the expense, instead of the Government of the United States paying the whole? I think there can be no question about that.

I do not care at this time to take up the time of the committee any further. I may have something to say about the different sections of the bill as they are reached in the reading. If any gentleman has any question to ask, I shall be happy to hear it. I may say I have given the matters contained in this bill as careful a consideration as I could, and other members of the committee have done the same.

Mr. HUNTON. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. COBB. Yes, sir.

Mr. HUNTON. I understand the gentleman from Indiana to have put these two appropriations into the bill against his own judgment and on account of the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. COBB. If the gentleman had listened to what I said he could not have so misunderstood me. I say there is no appropriation in this bill, and I repeat it, that is more just to the District of Columbia and its people than is the appropriation to maintain this jail and these persons at the insane asylum.

Mr. HUNTON. I understood the gentleman to say that if left to himself he would not have put that in.

Mr. COBB. I would have overlooked it perhaps, and in that way not put it in.

Mr. HUNTON. But that he put it in upon the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury and of the Comptroller.

Mr. COBB. No, sir, not upon their recommendation, but upon my judgment; and I think my judgment is pretty good on this bill.

Mr. HUNTON. That is a question to be determined.

Mr. COBB. I know the gentleman questions it. I understand that the gentleman is opposed to the bill, and for that reason I gave him time to discuss it, because I wanted to hear him upon all the points against the bill. I now propose to try to meet him in my own way as best I can, and I think I can do it. I think this bill is just. I may have made some mistakes, but they are not in these large matters.

I think it might be well for the committee to now rise for the purpose of limiting debate, and I will make that motion.

Mr. HUNTON. I do not think there is any need of that.

Mr. COBB. Then I will withdraw the motion.

The CHAIRMAN. If no other gentleman desires to take part in the general debate, the bill will now be read by paragraphs for amendment and debate under the five-minute rule.

Mr. COBB. I move to dispense with the first and formal reading of the bill.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill will now be read by paragraphs under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the half of the following sums named respectively is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and the other half out of the revenues of the District of Columbia, for the purposes following, being the estimated expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, namely:

FOR IMPROVEMENTS AND REPAIRS, AND FOR CARE AND REPAIR OF BRIDGES.

For repairs to concrete pavements, $50,000; for completion of New York avenue intercepting-sewer, $7,000; for repairs to macadam roadways, $5,000; for materials for permit work, $20,000; for continuation of surveys of the District of Columbia with reference to the extension of various avenues to the District line, $5,000; for Boundary street auxiliary sewer, $50,000; for lateral sewers, $15,000; for dredging James Creek Canal, $5,000; for work on sundry avenues and streets, and replacement of pavements on streets named in appendixes A and B annexed to the estimates of the commissioners of the District for 1882, (being schedules of streets requiring immediate attention,) $150,000; in all, $307,000.

Mr. HUNTON. I ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB] in charge of this bill to permit this paragraph to be passed over for the present until we have completed the consideration of the remainder of the bill.

Mr. COBB. I desire to have this bill considered and acted on as we go along.

Mr. HUNTON. I am sure the gentleman, like myself, will say to the committee that if we reduce appropriations in other parts of this bill this particular appropriation ought to be increased.

Mr. COBB. I can say to the gentleman that I do not think there is any danger of reducing the appropriations in this bill.

Mr. HUNTON. That is a mere matter of opinion. It can do no harm to pass over this paragraph for the present.

Mr. COBB. I prefer to have the bill considered and acted upon as we go along.

Mr. HUNTON. Then I have an amendment to offer. I move to amend lines 26 and 27, being the portion relating to the replacement of pavements on streets named in appendixes A and B, by striking out "$150,000" and inserting "$300,000," and I make that motion for reasons which I attempted to state to the Committee of the Whole awhile ago, that it is imposing upon the people of the District of Columbia to say that they shall not, for the space of six years, rid themselves of the rotten wooden pavements in this District, which are now becoming almost impassable, causing depreciation of property on those streets and avenues, and probably entailing disease and death upon the people. I am informed by Major Twining that if this appropriation is to be the rule on the subject, it will take six years to replace the wooden pavements of this District.

Mr. BUCKNER. I desire to inquire of the gentleman whether, if his motion is carried, he proposes to strike out the appropriation of $70,000 for the high school in another part of the bill?

Mr. HUNTON. So far as I am concerned I am going to keep in the appropriation of $70,000, but to have it devoted to the building of common-school houses. That is the reason why I proposed to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB] to pass over this portion of the bill now, so that we can see what in the end can be appropriated for the replacing of these rotten wooden pavements.

There is no gentleman here who desires to put additional burdens on the District of Columbia beyond what the people are now bearing. I want to appropriate all we can for the replacing of these rotten pavements. I think it should be greatly more than the $150,000 provided in this bill.

Mr. COBB. In reply to the gentleman I desire to say that if he will look over the schedule——

Mr. DUNNELL. What is the pending amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is to increase the appropriation for replacing the pavements on certain streets indicated from $150,000 to $300,000.

Mr. COBB. The object of the amendment is to increase the appropriation. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] says it is necessary in order to replace the rotten wooden pavements.

He suggested awhile ago that pestilence and infectious diseases might spring from these pavements. I will say to him that I have taken the advice and opinions of those whom I conceive to be the best physicians in the District of Columbia as to whether or not these wooden pavements are injurious to health. They concur with me that they are not now injurious; that the only time when health is injuriously affected by them is when they are taken up and exposed to the sun when improvements are going on.

One other thing I want to suggest to the gentleman. The commissioners for the District of Columbia do not confine themselves by any means to the streets for which we have made appropriations, but they go to the outer limits of the city and improve the streets there. They have improved H street where it never was improved before. Much of the money which we have appropriated they have expended upon streets that have never before been improved, and there is a great deal of complaint about it. I make no complaint myself, but I have heard such complaints, and I speak of it here because it seems to be a fact current among the people here. The commissioners do not expend the money we appropriate upon the streets the gentleman talks about.

Mr. HUNTON. How much has been expended on the other streets?

Mr. COBB. The gentleman cannot tell, neither can I.

Mr. HUNTON. No, sir. But I say that this appropriation is absolutely necessary to make these streets passable.

Mr. ROBESON. Will the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB] permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. COBB. Certainly.

Mr. ROBESON. I see that this appropriation is for "replacement of pavements on streets named in Appendixes A and B annexed to the estimates of the commissioners of the District for 1882, (being schedules of streets requiring immediate attention.)"

Now, I would like to know what are the estimates for the improvement of these streets named in Appendixes A and B, which the commissioners, to whom we have intrusted this duty, say require immediate attention?

Mr. COBB. I will tell the gentleman. The estimate is $320,000. The commissioners have now $419,000.

Mr. ROBESON. For those streets?

Mr. COBB. Yes; in part for those streets. If the gentleman will allow me I will explain to him. The schedule of streets is very large. As soon as the engineers have surveyed the streets and estimated the cost of improvements, the estimate is put into the schedule. Now, under a strict construction of the general law the commissioners would be required, in making this schedule, to include only such streets as can be improved, keeping within the estimated amount of the appropriation. This they have not done, though we make no complaint on that score. But as a matter of fact these Schedules A and B include streets which, if improved, would cost about a million and a half of dollars.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ROBESON. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word. I do this for the purpose of asking the gentleman a question. I would like to know whether, if this bill passes with the proposed appropriation of $150,000, the commissioners would be authorized to expend in "replacement of pavements on streets named in Appendixes A and B annexed to the estimates of commissioners of the District of Columbia" more than the $150,000 here appropriated.

Mr. COBB. No, sir.

Mr. ROBESON. Then the question recurs, without being confused by any other estimates or any suggestion that there is any other money available for this purpose, whether $150,000 is sufficient. These commissioners, who are experts upon this subject, and to whom we intrust the preparation of these estimates, say that $320,000 will be required. Now, I would like to know upon what principle of good economy, upon what principle of good government, upon what principle of examination, scientific or otherwise, it can be said that they can do for $150,000 work which they estimate will require $320,000?

We are here to make appropriations for this District, which is committed to our care. If the appropriation were for the district of any individual member of Congress, he would not dare to make such a proposition; for he would be defeated upon it by his constituents at the polls. But though the people of this District are powerless to hold us responsible, this question has been committed by the Constitution to our good faith and our broad statesmanship. Now, there are, as the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] states, fifteen miles of rotten wooden pavements——

Mr. HUNTON. Seventeen.

Mr. ROBESON. Over which no man can travel with comfort and in front of which no man can live with safety to his health. Now, I ask gentlemen of this House whether, for the sake of $150,000, we propose to go back upon the regular estimate of these commissioners, (who are non-partisan, who have neither personal nor political interest in this question,) and leave the citizens of Washington for the next year without remedy in this matter, simply because they have no vote on this question?

Mr. COBB. Does the gentleman desire me to answer the question he has propounded?

Mr. ROBESON. The gentleman has the opportunity, having charge of the bill.

Mr. COBB. I will answer the gentleman. As I said a while ago—I do not know whether it was in his hearing or not—I hold in my hand a letter from the chief of the warrant division of the Treasury Department, who, after a careful examination of the books, informs me that there is now on hand of the fund appropriated in last year's appropriation bill $419,000; and the gentleman from New Jersey wants to increase this to $700,000 or more.

Mr. ROBESON. But the gentleman has said, in response to my question, that if this bill passed in the form proposed only $150,000 can be spent for replacing pavements on these streets.

Mr. COBB. In addition to what has already been appropriated.

Mr. ROBESON. It makes no difference what appropriations there are on the books of the Treasury Department if they are not applicable for this purpose.

Mr. COBB. I answered the gentleman's question briefly, and I had reference to this bill only. This bill provides for an appropriation of $150,000. I said that in pursuance of this bill only $150,000 could be used for this purpose; but I will answer further that the commissioners have in their hands to-day $419,000 for this purpose.

Mr. ROBESON. Will the gentleman then insert in this bill a provision that the commissioners may, if required, use for this purpose any part of that $419,000?

Mr. COBB. No, sir; I am not willing to do that, (I answer the gentleman very frankly,) because I want some kind of account with regard to this great fund that is being appropriated for these purposes.

Mr. ROBESON. Then, if the gentleman is not willing to put such a provision in this bill, he is not willing to authorize them to expend that money.

Mr. COBB. No, sir; because they do not need it.

Mr. ROBESON. Are they not already authorized to spend it?

Mr. COBB. They are authorized until the 30th of June next to use that $419,000, and after that they will be authorized by this bill, if it passes in its present shape, to use $150,000.

Mr. ROBESON. I understand this bill will take effect from the 30th of June next.

Mr. COBB. That is just what I say.

Mr. ROBESON. Now the gentleman says there is an unexpended balance of appropriations applicable to the purposes for which this estimate is made, and he says that we should not appropriate in this bill more than $150,000, because of this other appropriation on the books of the Treasury, which, under the rulings of the Treasury Department construing the laws of Congress, cannot be applied to these improvements during the coming fiscal year.

Mr. HUNTON. The question of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] and the answer of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB] have, I think, conveyed to the Committee of the Whole an erroneous idea. I understood the gentleman from New Jersey to ask the gentleman from Indiana the amount estimated as necessary to repair the streets in Schedules A and B. Was that the gentleman's question?

Mr. ROBESON. Yes, sir.

Mr. HUNTON. And the gentleman from Indiana answered $320,000, as I understood.

Mr. COBB. Oh, no; I did not answer any such thing.

Mr. ROBESON. I so understood the gentleman.

Mr. COBB. One hundred and twenty thousand dollars.

Mr. HUNTON. If the gentleman from New Jersey and the gentleman from Indiana will look at the estimates as seen in Schedules A and B, they will find a different result from that stated by the latter gentleman. Schedule A contains all streets paved with wood and requiring new pavements.

Mr. ROBESON. What is the estimate?

Mr. HUNTON. Three hundred and ninety-five thousand six hundred and twenty-six dollars in Schedule A. In Schedule B are contained those which do not require immediate action as much as those in Schedule A, amounting to $604,320. Schedules A and B embrace all streets now paved with wood necessary to be replaced with handsome and beautiful pavement aggregating $999,320.

Mr. ROBESON. I understand for those which require immediate action and the continuance of which in their present condition not only interfere with the comfort but threaten the health of this District, $320,000 is required.

Mr. HUNTON. I say every street mentioned in either Schedule A or B is in the condition indicated by the gentleman.

Mr. ROBESON. What is it the gentleman proposes?

Mr. HUNTON. Three hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. ROBESON. Why not $320,000?

Mr. HUNTON. Because I am afraid we cannot get that much from the revenues of the District.

And I desire to say further, while I am up, that the engineer commissioner of the District who has this work solely in charge has estimated as necessary to replace these wooden pavements on streets of seventeen miles in length—necessary to be done now—it will take $995,000.

Mr. ROBESON. Which can be done cheaper now than at any other time.

Mr. HUNTON. It can be done as cheaply now as at any other time. The only question is what revenues of the District can be spared from other purposes to go on with that work now, attending first to Schedule A and next to those embraced by Schedule B. While there is absolute necessity for replacement, those in Schedule B are not so necessary as those in Schedule A.

Mr. ROBESON. Only half of this comes out of the Treasury.

Mr. HUNTON. That is all.

Mr. ROBESON. The other half out of the property-holders of the District?

Mr. HUNTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. COBB. I desire to answer one point made by the gentleman from Virginia. The gentleman says it is absolutely necessary to make these improvements in these streets embraced in the schedules referred to. Now, I say to the committee that many of these streets never were improved and never will be improved until the commissioners shall determine to do so. As I said a while ago—and if the gentleman will only listen to me I will give him the fact—many of the streets embraced in these schedules have been included whether they have been improved or not. They contain all the streets surveyed and estimated for, and yet not one-half of them have any wooden pavements upon them.

Mr. ROBESON. I am willing the gentleman should limit it to replacing wooden pavements. I withdraw my formal amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTON.]

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 47, noes 45.

Mr. COBB demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. COBB and Mr. HUNTON were appointed.

The Committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 70, noes 47.

Mr. COBB. I give notice that I shall demand the yeas and nays on this amendment in the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has that right.

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to call the yeas and nays in the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is agreed to.

Mr. HAWLEY. I offer this amendment. This sum of $150,000 has been raised to $300,000 by this amendment just carried. Now, I move to add the words "of which $225,000 shall be paid from the Treasury of the United States."

Mr. FINLEY. I rise to a question of order. Was there a quorum on the last vote?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's point comes too late.

Mr. FINLEY. The gentleman from Pennsylvania raised the question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania simply to give notice that he would demand a vote by yeas and nays in the House.

Mr. FINLEY. The gentleman said also there was no quorum voting.

Mr. ATHERTON. He immediately followed the announcement with the other suggestion.

Mr. WRIGHT. Yes; I raised the question of quorum at the same time.

The CHAIRMAN. As the gentleman from Pennsylvania states he made the point in time, the Chair will direct the tellers to resume their places.

Mr. HUNTON. The question was taken and was decided, and the Chairman announced the result that the amendment was adopted, after which another amendment was proposed by the gentleman from Connecticut. The question of a quorum, therefore, comes too late.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania says he did make at the time the point that there was no quorum voting, and the Chair is bound to take his statement. The tellers will resume their places, and those who have not voted will be kind enough to pass between the tellers.

After some time the tellers reported—ayes 89, noes 59.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COBB. I give notice I shall demand the yeas and nays on the amendment in the House.

Mr. HAWLEY. Now, Mr. Chairman, I renew the amendment I proposed. Line 26 as amended reads "$300,000." I move to amend by adding:

Of which sum $225,000 shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States

I do that for this reason——

Mr. COBB. I reserve the point of order upon that amendment, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) It changes existing law.

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not regard the amendment as changing existing law, for we are now making provision for——

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) The law now provides that one-half of the expenses shall be paid by the city and one-half by the General Government. The amendment of the gentleman contemplates a larger proportion being paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. HAWLEY. This may be out of order technically, under the language of the law, but——

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) It is under the general law.

Mr. HAWLEY. Very well, I am perfectly willing to be very liberal with the District of Columbia, provided we do not exercise our liberality at the expense of the tax-payers and property-holders of the District. The law as it now exists provides that one-half of the expenses, as the gentleman has stated, are to be paid out of the District revenues and one-half by the General Government. But an examination of this bill shows that one-half of the amount contemplated to be appropriated here for District expenses reaches the sum of $1,637,000, which is to be paid by the tax-payers of this District. Now, I agree with gentlemen in general, that one-half of the revenues being paid by the Government is liberal. In a certain view it is liberal. But we are doing an immensity of work in this District, or authorizing it to be done—work that no community of 170,000 people throughout the whole country would undertake to provide for in any one year; and yet we contemplate that this vast sum of money shall be paid by the people of this District. Our improvements extend in every direction. Gentlemen will see and readily comprehend that we are improving beyond what would be required or expected in any other city of this size in the country. We have our broad avenues, our beautiful parks, our handsome squares and triangles, our aqueduct, miles upon miles of splendid pavement, and many fine streets running out even beyond the actual settlements. I do not regard the payment of one-half as too liberal an allowance under the circumstances. It is simply an act of justice. I do not believe that gentlemen can point to any other city in the United States containing a population of 170,000 that would undertake to expend $1,637,000 in any one year. But you require it to be done. The tax-payers have no volition. Gentlemen desire to see this city beautified and adorned, they desire to see these old, decayed wooden pavements removed. So do I. There is in the bill as reported $150,000 provided for that purpose. There is money unexpended in the Treasury for the current fiscal year for that purpose. But gentlemen now say that is not enough. They want to increase that amount to $300,000.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am willing that this increase shall be made if of this extraordinary sum appropriated for this purpose $225,000 be taken out of the Treasury of the United States, leaving the District to pay $75,000 as contemplated in the original bill. I am willing to be liberal here, but I do not wish to encourage such liberality at the expense of the poor tax-payers of this District. I desire to see the city grow. I desire to see it prosper. I am as anxious as any other gentleman here to see it what it ought to be. We all have, in that respect, a common pride, but gentlemen must remember at the same time that it is not wise to impose too heavy burdens upon the tax-paying power of this people; burdens that they cannot sustain and which, instead of promoting the growth of the city, will force them to remove and live in less expensive localities. Such a policy as is proposed here, instead of promoting the growth of the city would tend rather to repress it.

Mr. NEAL. I will state to the gentleman from Connecticut that the rate of taxation is fixed by law at 1½ per cent. upon the assessed valuation of property in the city, and outside of the city it is only 1 per cent. I venture to say there is no town in the United States, containing a population of 10,000 people, where the rate of taxation is not heavier than it is here, and therefore the burden of taxation of which the gentleman speaks is not felt at all as it is in other cities.

Mr. HAWLEY. Very well; let that be so. Admitting that the rate of taxation is fixed at only 1½ per cent., this is a proposition which looks eventually to the increase of that rate. At all events, this expenditure will come out of the 1½ per cent. tax; and there would be no great harm in having a surplus on hand. If we do not increase this to $300,000 there will be a surplus, which I imagine will not be an objectionable feature.

Mr. NEAL. The result would be to raise taxation that ought to be reduced.

Mr. HAWLEY. Then let it be reduced.

Mr. NEAL. The fact of the matter is that this city enjoys exceptional privileges over any other city in the country. This rate of taxation was fixed after a thorough debate in the Forty-fifth Congress, and I am not willing to see that law changed at this time.

Mr. HAWLEY. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that, with reference to a general provision of this kind, it is difficult, as the gentleman will readily perceive, to draw a comparison between rates of taxation in different localities. He will see that it must depend to a considerable extent upon how closely the assessment law is followed and other facts entering into it. Before forming a judgment of that kind I would like to know how thorough the assessment has been, or how nearly the appraisement of the value of property approximates its true value. It is a fact, as the gentleman will doubtless admit, that a taxation of 1½ per cent. under certain circumstances might be higher than a 3 per cent. rate in another place and under different conditions.

Mr. NEAL. I have only to say that the assessment is made here by sworn officers, whose duty it is to assess personal property and real estate at its true value in money. It is the law of Ohio, and I presume it is so also in Connecticut. It is certainly the case in all Western States, and as a matter of course it depends upon the judgment and conscience of the assessor. It may be higher here or lower. We cannot make a comparison unless we are familiar with the property and the assessment rates of other cities.

Mr. BARBER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio if these expenses for street improvements are taken out of the general fund, or levied as a special assessment?

Mr. NEAL. Out of the general fund.

Mr. COBB. I insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana makes the point of order that the amendment changes existing law and does not retrench expenditures. The Chair is of opinion the point of order is well taken.

The Clerk read the following:

For Washington Asylum: For one commissioner and intendant, $1,200; one matron, $600; one visiting physician, $1,200; one resident physician, $480; one engineer, $600; one assistant engineer, $300; one overseer, $800; one clerk, $480; one baker, $420; five overseers, at $600 each; one watchman, $300; three watchmen, at $180 each; one driver, $120; one hostler, $60; one cook, $120; two cooks, at $60 each; five nurses, at $60 each; and for contingent expenses, including improvements, repairs, provisions, fuel, forage, lumber, shoes, clothing, hardware, dry goods, medicines, and miscellaneous items, $30,000; in all, $40,760.

Mr. HUNTON. I offer the following amendment:

In line 45, strike out "one" and insert "four;" and in line 46, strike out "three watchmen, at $180;" so that it will read: "Four watchmen, $300 each."

Mr. COBB. I make the point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the point of order?

Mr. COBB. It increases expenditures, and there is no provision of law authorizing it.

Mr. HUNTON. The amendment does not change existing law.

Mr. COBB. It is in the direction of increasing expenditures.

Mr. HUNTON. But an amendment must change existing law and not be in the interest of economy before it can be ruled out of order.

I will explain the amendment so that it may be better understood whether the point of order applies. The bill as it now stands provides for four watchmen. One of them is to be paid $300 and the other three $180 each. I propose to put them all on the same pay but not to increase the number of watchmen, so that my amendment does not change existing law. It keeps the bill where it was last year, as I understand it—four watchmen at $300 each. I see no reason why one watchman should receive $300 and another, doing exactly the same duty, should receive $180.

Mr. COBB. I will state that this amendment does change existing law. The present law gives to one of these watchmen $300, and to the other three $180 each. That is the law now. This amendment increases the pay of three watchmen from $180 to $300, and therefore I think it comes within the inhibition of Rule XXI.

Mr. HUNTON. Rule XXI, as I understand it, provides that an amendment must involve a change of law in order to be ruled out. Now, the present law provides for four watchmen, and the question is what they shall be paid. It is not a change of law, but a question of compensation of officers already provided for.

Mr. COBB. It is a change of law as to their salaries. A change of their pay is a change of law, and a very important change.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion if the amendment changes the compensation it changes existing law. The Chair is not advised, however, what is the compensation provided by existing law.

Mr. HUNTON. I desire to understand what is the ruling of the Chair. The law now provides for four watchmen, and I do not understand it to be any violation of Rule XXI to move an increase of compensation for any officer provided by law. My amendment does not increase the number.

The CHAIRMAN. If the compensation is fixed by law the amendment would change existing law.

Mr. HUNTON. It is only fixed in an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from Indiana to say that it was fixed by law.

Mr. COBB. There is no law fixing the compensation of these officers except the appropriation bills. These are the only law on the subject. That was what I meant when I said the amendment changes existing law, because, as the law now exists, one of these men gets $300 and the others but $180.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. This question was decided the other day in Committee of the Whole upon a point of order raised by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. KEIFER,] the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARLISLE] being in the chair. The chairman of the Committee of the Whole held that an appropriation bill was the existing law; in other words, the law now in existence under which these parties are paid.

Mr. HUNTON. I never heard it ruled in Committeee of the Whole that where an appropriation bill provides for certain officers at a certain compensation it was not in order in Committee of the Whole to move an increase of compensation. If you move an increase of the number of the officers you change the law. But if you merely move an increase of the compensation, you do not. There is no law fixing the compensation except the appropriation bills.

The CHAIRMAN. As the Chair now understands the gentleman from Indiana, he states that the appropriation act of last year fixed the compensation of these officers. That is, then, the existing law. Now, if this amendment changes that existing law, the Chair is of the opinion that it is subject to a point of order.

Mr. HAWLEY. I would like to be heard on that for a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. HAWLEY. The existing law to which I understood the Chair to refer is only a law for this current year, and is dead on the 30th June; having performed its office it is ended completely. The law we are making now, the bill in our hands, is the law for a period when without it there is no law. This is to be the law for the year beginning the 1st of next July. It does not change any existing law, for there is no law appropriating for next year until we shall have passed this. These appropriation bills in general make appropriations for but one year; and in some years a greater and in some a less number of officers will be required; in one year four watchmen may be wanted, in another seven, in another nine. And we are not, by providing a different number of watchmen for next year, or a different compensation, changing any existing law, because for that period there is absolutely no law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will submit the question to the committee without deciding the point himself. It will occupy shorter time to take the vote than to discuss and decide the point of order.

The question being taken on the amendment, there were—ayes 17, noes 40.

So (further count not being called for) the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

For the support of the indigent insane of the District of Columbia in the Government Hospital for the Insane in said District, as provided in sections 4843, 4844, and 4850 of the Revised Statutes, $80,000.

Mr. HUNTON. I offer the following amendment:

Strike out "$80,000" and insert "$37,000."

Mr. Chairman, as I stated a while ago, the Government Hospital for the Insane in the District of Columbia is an institution wholly belonging to the Federal Government, and does not, therefore, come within the provisions of the organic act. The organic act says where the District is called upon to support in part any of these institutions such institution must at the date of the passage of the organic act have belonged to or been controlled wholly or in part by the District of Columbia. Now there is not a pretense at all that this institution was owned wholly or in part or controlled wholly or in part by the District of Columbia, and therefore it does not come within the provisions of the organic act.

I made this same point last year. It was overruled, and the appropriation that was demanded in the last bill was reduced to $37,000. I believe the amount asked for was the same as here.

Mr. COBB. The amount in the bill originally was $45,000.

Mr. HUNTON. Last year, in the bill as reported from the Committee on Appropriations, this item was $45,000. When the bill went to the Senate the item was either stricken out entirely or the amount greatly reduced. In the conference between the two Houses, after hearing all the testimony of the parties connected with this institution and the parties opposed to this appropriation, the committee of conference put in an appropriation of $37,000 for this purpose.

Now, while I do not think this expenditure should be a burden on the people of the District at all, under the terms of the organic act, yet as this amount was agreed upon in the conference between the two Houses at the last session of Congress, I do not propose to disturb the agreement then reached, but ask that the appropriation be now put at the amount which was agreed upon last year. I therefore have moved to reduce the amount in this item from $80,000 to $37,000.

Mr. COBB. I desire to state that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] is mistaken, I think, when he says this institution is not controlled "in whole or in part by the District of Columbia." I quote the language of the organic act on that subject. By law it is made the duty of certain officers to act in behalf of the District of Columbia in determining the question as to who shall be sent from the District to this insane asylum. If that is not controlling the asylum to that extent, I do not know what provision of law could be enacted "to control in part" that institution.

The inmates from the District of Columbia who have been sent there have been sent by virtue of law, under the direction of the District authorities, as prescribed by law. No man or woman can be sent there and charged against this District except it is done by the District authorities. Therefore, under the strictest rule of construction which the learned gentleman can apply, this provision in language and in spirit comes clearly within the organic law.

The proposed amendment is simply an attempt to force upon the United States Government the full cost of maintaining the inmates that are sent to this institution by the officials of the District of Columbia. I say that ought not to be done, unless we believe that the Government of the United States ought in equity to pay for the keeping of the indigent insane of this district.

Mr. CLAFLIN. Will the gentleman inform us how many inmates there are in this institution from the District?

Mr. COBB. I think there are three hundred and sixteen. I ought to have the data before me, and if I had expected that this bill would have come up to-day I would have had it here. Perhaps I have it here now. I will see, because I wish to be accurate and do not desire to mislead.

Mr. CLAFLIN. What is the whole number in that institution?

Mr. COBB. The whole number I think is eight hundred and ninety-four.

Mr. CLAFLIN. Something over one-third are from the District.

Mr. COBB. Yes, sir. I think I can now refer the gentleman to the exact statistics. I have here a letter written by Dr. Godding, the superintendent of the Insane Hospital, addressed to the acting First Comptroller of the Treasury. It is as follows:

GOVERNMENT HOSPITAL FOR THE INSANE,
Washington, D. C., November 11, 1880.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 10th instant requesting an estimate of the expense of supporting the indigent insane of the District of Columbia at this hospital during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882.

The number of indigent insane, residents of the District of Columbia, under treatment in the hospital June 30, 1879, was 322; on the 30th of June, 1880, it was 345, showing an increase of a little more than 7 per cent. during the year

It seems that I was mistaken, it was 345 instead of 316. I wanted to be within the correct number.

Assuming that this rate of increase, which is rather less than that of the previous year, will continue, the number on the 30th of June, 1881, will be 369, and on the 30th of June, 1882, 395, or an average residence of 382 for the year ending with that date. In addition to the above, on the 30th of June, 1880, there were under treatment in the hospital and a charge to the District of Columbia 16 non-resident insane, admitted under section 4850, title 59, chapter 4, Revised Statutes of the United States. There was the same number under treatment at the close of the previous year, and probably the average number of this class under treatment will continue at about the same figure. Adding these to the number of resident indigent insane of the District of Columbia, since they are all a charge to the District, the probable average number to be supported during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, will be 398. It is estimated that the cost of support, independent of the cost of new buildings and special repairs for each patient in the Government Hospital for the Insane, is $225 per annum, which would make the probable cost of supporting the indigent insane of the District of Columbia for the year ending June 30, 1882, $89,550.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. W. GODDING,
Superintendent.

Hon. J. TARBELL,
Acting First Comptroller, United States Treasury Department.

Mr. HUNTON. I desire to say——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted upon the pending amendment.

Mr. COBB. I desire to say a word or two further, and for that purpose I will move to strike out the last word.

The committee will observe that this estimate is not based on the value of the buildings which the Government affords, but is the mere naked expense of keeping these inmates. We have perhaps a million and a half or two millions of dollars invested in that asylum; I do not know how much. There are about four hundred acres of land, and several large, fine buildings. As the superintendent says, this estimate does not include any portion of the estimates for improvements during the year 1882.

Now if it be just that the District of Columbia should pay one-half of the expenses of caring and providing for its indigent insane, then instead of $80,000 which this bill provides for, the amount ought to be $89,550, as estimated by the superintendent. Now, if that is wrong and if the Government of the United States ought to maintain the indigent insane from the District of Columbia, then let us do so, and appropriate the people's money in order to save the tax-payers of the District of Columbia from bearing any portion of this expense. Let us do justice.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB] states that there are in this asylum more than three hundred insane persons who are chargeable to the District of Columbia. Now every one who has examined the statistics of insanity must know that more than three hundred insane persons in a population of 175,000 are largely beyond the average. The fact is that every person employed here for the Government, no matter how temporarily, if he becomes insane while here, is charged to the District of Columbia. There is no justice or equity in such a thing.

Mr. DUNNELL. Does the gentleman mean to say that every such person is charged wholly to the District?

Mr. NEAL. The money appropriated comes half from the Government and the other half from the people of the District, for the reason that one-half the property in this District belongs to the Government. It is not a matter of charity upon the part of the Government to pay one-half the taxes; it is simply paying what would be assessed upon the property of the United States if that property were assessed as is the property of individuals. Last year this matter was thoroughly discussed in the committee, and it was agreed that a fair proportion of the expenses of this asylum properly chargeable to the District would be $37,000. It seems to me we shall do gross injustice to the people of the District if we impose upon them any greater burden than that.

Moreover, this institution is not under the care of the District or its officials; it is under the care of officers of the Government; and every one knows that an institution which is managed in this way is much more expensively managed than if under the control of individuals. That is another reason why the full proportion of these expenses should not be charged to the people of this District. I trust that the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia will be adopted.

Mr. HUNTON. I desire to say one word in reply to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. COBB.]

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted.

Mr. COBB. I withdraw my formal amendment.

Mr. HUNTON. I renew it. The gentleman from Indiana says that this asylum is one of the charitable institutions of the District, and comes specifically within the language of the organic act. I take issue with the gentleman on that point. To bring it within the organic act, it must belong to the District or be controlled wholly or in part by the District. It neither wholly or in part belongs to the District; nor is it wholly or in part controlled by the District. I have before me the law on the subject of this Government hospital for the insane. I read from the Revised Statutes:

SEC. 4838. There shall be in the District of Columbia a Government hospital for the insane, and its objects shall be the most humane care and enlightened curative treatment of the insane of the Army and Navy of the United States and of the District of Columbia.

Then, it is provided that the chief executive officer of the institution shall be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior. All the officers are appointed by the Federal Government. Let me call the attention of the gentleman from Indiana also to the following provision:

SEC. 4858. All appropriations of money by Congress for the support of the hospital for the insane shall be drawn from the Treasury on the requisition of the Secretary of the Interior, and shall be disbursed and accounted for in all respects according to the laws regulating ordinary disbursements of public money.

So that according to the law in force at the time that the organic act of June 11, 1878, was enacted, this hospital for the insane was a Government institution, wholly owned and wholly controlled by the Federal Government, and was supported by appropriations out of the Federal Treasury expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior. Therefore I am right when I say this institution is not one of those embraced in the organic act.

But as the last Congress, after mature consideration by a committee of conference which heard evidence on both sides, agreed to impose upon the District of Columbia the payment of $37,000 for the support of insane persons from this District, I do not oppose an appropriation of that amount; but I do oppose any appropriation beyond that sum. The gentleman from Indiana argues that there are more insane persons from this District in this asylum than would be supported by $37,000. Agreed; grant that he is right in that statement; but is every man temporarily in this District, (and we know that thousands come here every year, who vote in the States from which they come and are in no sense residents of the District,) is every man thus temporarily here on business of the Federal Government, and for whom that Government has provided a hospital, to be charged to the people of the District of Columbia when he becomes insane? I say that such a system does gross injustice to the people of this District, and I trust that no such injustice will be perpetrated.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I find on examination of the act under which this asylum was built, that it was erected by the Government and paid for out of the Treasury. I find also that it is controlled by the Government. The class of patients admitted primarily into the establisment are from the Army and Navy. Then under one section of the Revised Statutes it is provided that the indigent insane of the District of Columbia may be admitted. Gentlemen argue that this institution is controlled by the United States Government, not by the District. Why, sir, the District itself is controlled by the United States.

Now I apprehend that the right thing for the United States to do is to provide for the support of the insane of the Army and Navy, and then as to the insane of the District who are admitted into this asylum, although the District did not bear the burden of building it, the people of the District ought by taxation to pay one-half of the expense of supporting such indigent insane. If I knew how many indigent insane of this District are in the asylum, or will be there during the next fiscal year, I could determine how much the District ought to pay. I listened to the report read by the gentleman from Indiana; and in that report it is estimated that the support of the indigent insane of this District—not of the Army or the Navy—will cost $89,000. In my opinion the people at large ought to pay one-half of this expense under the law, and the people of the District the other half. I shall not vote for this amendment; I would sooner vote to increase the amount of the appropriation by making it $89,000 instead of $80,000.

Mr. HUNTON. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. HUNTON to strike out, in line 72, "$80,000" and insert "$37,000," it was not agreed to, there being—ayes 23, noes 49.

The Clerk read as follows, under the heading "For Reform School:"

For subsistence: For groceries, $5,000; for flour, $3,000; for meat, $2,000; for dry goods, $2,600; for leather, $600; for gas, $600; for coal, $2,160; for hardware, table, and wooden ware, $554; for furniture, $600; for farm implements and seed, $600; for harness and repairs to same, $300; for fertilizers, $500; for stationery and books, $300; for plumbing, painting, and glazing, $600; for medicine and medical attention, $600; for miscellaneous expenditures, $1,000; in all, $21,014.

Mr. HUNTON. I move to amend by inserting at the end of the paragraph just read the following:

And the board of trustees of said Reform School are hereby authorized to use the balance of the fund due from the trustees of Jay Cooke & Co. for the erection of workshops for said schools.

Perhaps I ought to explain that this Reform School had funds on deposit with the banking-house of Jay Cooke & Co. at the time of its suspension. A portion of the amount received from the trustees of Jay Cooke & Co. as a dividend to the creditors of that concern has been appropriated for the purchase of a piece of land to be added to the farm of the Reform School. The trustees of that school now desire authority from Congress to use the balance of that fund in the erection of workshops. I presume there will be no objection to it.

Mr. COBB. I understand the drift of the gentleman's amendment. I have not looked into the question in regard to the debt he proposes to turn into this institution, but I am inclined to believe it is not necessary. This Reform School has only one hundred and fifty regular inmates. It has a farm of about three hundred acres belonging to it. I do not understand, unless it is necessary, why we should extend this institution largely for the purpose of inducing others to go there and be accommodated, which seems to be the desire, speaking generally in reference to all these institutions, of all those who are at the head of them.

If this Committee of the Whole, Mr. Chairman, will look over the extent of the charitable institutions in this District and the amount of charities here bestowed, it will be something astonishing to their minds. I have gone over the field, and although I do not profess to be absolutely accurate in my figures, nevertheless I believe I am entirely within the limits. There are 21,935 persons who received treatment at the hands of the public in this city last year. How much the cold winter we are passing through will increase that number I am unable to say. Thirty-five thousand four hundred and seventy-four prescriptions were made up for others. This is something alarming, and shows the inducement held out here, or something else to produce this result, which I think ought not to be increased. If we have 21,000 persons in this city or District who require alms at the hands of the Government there must be something wrong. There must be some cause for it. When, beside, we give 35,474 prescriptions, something must be wrong in addition. Then there are treated regularly 3,131 people in this city, to say nothing of Providence Hospital, Saint Ann's Hospital, and other eleemosynary institutions in this District. These figures should be looked to.

Now, should we extend all these charities and charitable institutions as asked for by the heads of these various institutions and thereby invite people to come from all the States of the Union to prey upon the public here? There is a dispensary here dispensing medicines to every one who may apply for them. There are other institutions likewise dispensing medicines in this city. Take the Columbia Hospital for Women and Lying-in-Asylum. Over five hundred women were treated there and I have not included them in the estimate I have already given. Some gentleman here says they ought to be charged to Congress. [Laughter.] Well, I do not know anything about that, but I know they ought not to be charged to me, and if the gentleman wishes to assume part of the expense, it ought to be paid by him and not by the Treasury.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Will you take a note? [Laughter.]

Mr. COBB. This institution so far as the inmates are concerned is well managed. It has been my duty to look into it. I have done so. It is as economically managed as any in the city. But this increase of appropriation for these purposes serves only as an inducement to people to come here from other places and feed at the public expense. They certainly do come. I will not suggest a remedy but I will say before we appropriate money to increase the capacity of these reformatory and charitable institutions we ought first to look and see whether it is at all necessary.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HUNTON. I do not understand the speech of my friend from Indiana.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the pending amendment.

Mr. HUNTON. I move to strike out the last word. He has spoken of almost everything except the amendment. He has given us a very fine dissertation on the paupers in this District. It may be all true, but it has nothing to do with this amendment. The amendment merely authorizes the trustees of the Reform School to expend their own money, and does not appropriate one dollar out of the Treasury. It authorizes them to expend their own money for a most proper object. My friend from Ohio [Mr. NEAL] and myself have been out to visit this Reform School, and I think we know something about it; and a better managed institution I do not know in connection with charities in the District. When these boys are out there they need workshops to teach them skilled labor.

Mr. COBB. Put them on a farm.

Mr. HUNTON. Yes, put them on a farm. They need work-shops, too. You would not put them on a farm in such weather as this. The work-shop is to employ them when the weather will not permit them to work on the farm. This Reform School had money deposited with Jay Cooke & Co., belonging to the school, and not to the Government. A portion is still in the hands of Jay Cooke & Co., in dividends declared. This institution only asks power to spend its own money in building work-shops. Surely there can be no objection to that. I withdraw my formal amendment.

Mr. HUNTON'S amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For maintaining the jail: For one warden, $1,800; one physician, $1,000; deputy warden, $1,100; three guards, at $1,000 each; fifteen guards, at $900 each; one engineer, at $1,000; one assistant engineer, at $900; four firemen, at $800 each; one messenger, $700; two cooks, at $420 each; in all, $27,040.

Mr. HUNTON. I rise to a point of order on that portion of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HUNTON. My point of order is that it changes existing law and is not in the interest of economy. This point of order is raised for the following reasons: the twenty-first rule declares in substance that it is not in order to change existing law unless it be in the interest of economy. Now, Mr. Chairman, this provision is not in accordance with the existing law. Under the existing law the support of this jail should not be put on the District of Columbia. I beg leave to state, sir, to my friend from Indiana, and I think he will admit it, that never until now, I believe, has the attempt even been made, certainly no appropriation bill was ever passed in this House to impose upon the District of Columbia the support of the jail. But this appropriation bill, in violation of the existing law, has incorporated in it a paragraph imposing upon the District of Columbia the support of the jail of the District.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to call your attention to the law governing this case, and to show you that it is not recognized by existing law. The organic law providing for the government of the District of Columbia, approved on the 11th of June, 1878, which governs the appropriation bills for the District of Columbia, says:

That the cost of maintaining all public institutions of charity, reformatories, and prisons belonging to or controlled wholly or in part by the District of Columbia, and which are now by law supported wholly or in part by the District of Columbia or the United States.

I read an extract from the third section of the act approved June 11, 1878. It will be seen from that organic act, to which I desire to call the special attention of the Chair, that no prison or charitable institution can be estimated for or put into this appropriation bill unless at the date of the law—the 11th of June, 1878—it was owned or controlled wholly or in part by the District of Columbia. That is the law, sir. It must have been under the control wholly or in part, or it must have belonged wholly or in part to the District of Columbia. Now, the gentleman from Indiana will hardly deny that up to this moment the jail of this District is owned entirely by the Federal Government, and controlled wholly by the Federal Government, and if that be the case, sir, this clause of the appropriation bill is in contravention of the law of 1878, which specifies which of these prisons shall be appropriated for by the District of Columbia. And if this appropriation is beyond the provisions of the law of 1878, then it is a change of existing law, and is out of order.

Mr. COBB. Mr. Chairman, I think there can be no question but that this jail is within the provision of the organic law which has been cited by the gentleman from Virginia. That act provides that institutions controlled or owned wholly or in part by the District of Columbia or which are now supported wholly or in part—that is about the language, I believe. Now, the question is what control is meant by this act.

This jail is perfectly under the control of the District of Columbia or the District authorities, except in so far as the mere management of it is concerned—its officers and those who superintend the prisoners after they are sent there; otherwise it is under the control of the District. But the District authorities control every prisoner that goes to that jail; and I submit that is a control in part, and it is a control that is perhaps more important than any other control you can have over that institution. Now, if that is what is meant by the act, and I understand it is, the judges of the District court here send the prisoners to that jail or take them out by their order for trial. They are tried or recommitted there or they are sent away, and it is as much a District institution, although appropriated for heretofore by the Government of the United States, as the public school buildings in the District are. I have no desire to consume the time of the committee in discussing the point of order. I made the point with regard to the insane asylum, and I think it is good in this case.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Chairman, we are referred by the gentleman from Virginia on this point of order to the third section of the act providing for a permanent government for this city, in which provision is made for the expenses of the government of the District, it being directed that certain estimates shall be submitted for the cost of maintaining all public institutions, charities, reformatories, and prisons belonging wholly or in part or controlled by the District of Columbia. This is a jail or public prison for the District of Columbia. It is an institution for the District into which the District prisoners are put. That being the case it is certainly a District institution. How will we determine that it is not? For what use is it? If it is not a jail for the District, then what is it? I would ask if the criminals arrested by authority of the District of Columbia, and not permitted to go on bail, are not consigned to that prison? Every convict who is sentenced to servitude or confinement in jail, made a convict in the courts of this District under the enforcement of the laws here for the punishment of crime in the District, or for the preservation of good order in the District, is sent to that District jail. If the jail of the District is not one of the institutions of the District, and specially named as one by the act, and is not one of the institutions authorized to be embraced in the provisions of the appropriation bill, then I must confess that I am at a loss to know what items could be inserted in this bill. Under the language of law no clearer than that, you might appropriate out of the general Treasury for everything belonging to the District and relieve the people entirely of all burdens of taxation.

Mr. Chairman, no one more earnestly than myself opposed this law for the permanent organization of the government of the District of Columbia because of my belief in its injustice. But Congress was prepared to enact it and did enact it, and now I hope, sir, as it has been enacted, that we shall not go beyond its plain intent and determine that provision outside of the law shall be made for the support of institutions of the District of Columbia.

When a proposition comes before this House in relation to this city it seems, as a general thing, that its extravagance insures its success. I have felt very often that if our constituents could be the witnesses of our actions, if our constituents could see the light manner in which we impose burdens upon them which should be borne by others, and bring us to an account for it, we should see less of this kind of legislation than we do.

Upon the point of order: if language means anything, interpreted with a view to the facts to which it is applied, the jail of the District of Columbia is embraced in the institutions of the city for which estimates and appropriations shall be made under the law for the permanent government of the District of Columbia.

Mr. HUNTON. I desire to say a word or two. I submit because my friend from Texas is opposed to the original organic act which became law June 11, 1878, that does not at all affect the question of order under consideration. I know that whenever that organic act of 1878 has been mentioned, it is to my friend from Texas like a sight of water to a person affected with hydrophobia. My friend always gets mad, I always expect him to get mad when that law is mentioned, but it is a law notwithstanding, and a law the justice of which cannot be successfully assailed, in my opinion. The question is whether the appropriation under consideration changes that law or no.

My friend from Indiana [Mr. COBB] admits that unless the District of Columbia had some interest in this jail or some control over it, it does not come within the organic act; and the organic act prohibits any appropriation for any object not embraced in its provisions.

Mr. COBB. Will the gentleman allow me to propound a question to him?

Mr. HUNTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. COBB. I want to ask the gentleman from Virginia, if the District of Columbia and its authorities have the control to send every person who goes to that jail at any time, whether or not that is a control within the spirit and letter of the organic law?

Mr. HUNTON. I was coming to that which was the gist of the gentleman's argument. I was going to answer that and would have done it just as carefully and thoroughly without the question as with it. The gentleman from Indiana contends that unless the District of Columbia owned in whole or in part or controlled in whole or in part, then this appropriation is a change of existing law and amenable to my point of order. Now, I say, Mr. Chairman, with great respect for my friend from Indiana, that not one word he has uttered here has shown the slightest control of this institution by the District of Columbia. He does not pretend it is owned in whole or in part, but he does maintain it is controlled in whole or in part by the District. Well, what sort of argument does he make to show it is controlled by the District? The District courts, he says, send the prisoners there. The District does not send them. The District commissioners have no power to send a man to the jail, and they are the authorities of the District. You cannot send a man to the jail of the city of Washington unless the courts of the District send him there, and the courts of the District are in no sense of the word subordinate to or controlled by the commissioners. They are Federal officers appointed by the President and paid out of the Federal Treasury exclusively; and the prisoners sent there are sent without the consent or approbation of the commissioners of the District; and therefore there is no control, even by sending persons to the jail by the District of Columbia in whole or in part.

I submit, further, Mr. Chairman, that if the commissioners had the power to send prisoners there, the very moment they entered within the walls of that jail their authority would cease. That jail is controlled by Federal authority, and sending a man there does not amount to any control of the institution whatever. But even if the gentleman from Indiana was right, that sending prisoners there amounted to a control of the institution, the fact is they are sent there by the courts, Federal officers appointed by the President of the United States and paid out of the Federal Treasury. And it is singular if this be embraced in the organic act that no attempt was ever made to put the jail on the District of Columbia before. This is the very first time that attempt has been made. But year by year certain gentlemen in this House have been trenching on the provisions of that organic act and putting into the appropriation bills objects to be supported by the District of Columbia which were not in the organic act when passed, and were not contemplated by those who enacted it.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not think that this paragraph is liable to the point of order made by my friend from Virginia. He states with great earnestness and reiterates it that under the organic law we cannot compel the District of Columbia to pay any part of the expense of this jail. That is absolutely true. Nobody will question that. It needs no argument. My friend from Indiana [Mr. COBB] who has charge of the bill, accepts that as existing law, and his proposition is to change it, and it is to change it in the interest of economy. And how? Here is a prison in this District in which are kept prisoners sent by the courts of the District, and at this moment this Federal Government is paying every dollar of the expense of a jail for this District. The people of this country, in other words, come here with contributions to pay the expense of every prisoner who enters that jail, sent there by the courts of this District.

Mr. HUNTON. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BLOUNT. In a moment I will.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the proposition of the gentleman from Indiana in this bill is that instead of appropriating from the Federal Treasury the whole amount of those expenditures, it shall be one-half. Therefore, to my mind, it is clear and indisputable that the proposition is in conformity with this rule, which was intended to meet just such propositions. Now I will hear my friend from Virginia.

Mr. HUNTON. My friend from Georgia says the prisoners from the District of Columbia are sent there and therefore the people of the District ought to support the jail. Now, I wish to ask my friend from Georgia if the prisoners from his district, presided over by a United States district judge, are not sent to prison, and whether the people of that district pay for those prisoners or the people of the United States. And I ask, in addition, if the people in your district do not provide for the support of their prisoners in their jails, why should the people in this District provide for the support of the prisoners in its jails?

Mr. BLOUNT. The people of my district as a local community take charge of crime and punish it and pay the expenses of prisoners, and in local matters in this District the same thing should adhere, as also in regard to every other community.

Mr. ROBESON. We have various Territories in this country that are governed by Federal law, and the expenses of which are paid out of the Federal Treasury.

Mr. BOUCK. No, sir; the expense of enforcing territorial laws is paid by territorial appropriations.

Mr. ROBESON. I have not said anything about that.

Mr. BOUCK. No, but you were going to. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBESON. The District of Columbia is a Territory of the United States. In all the Territories the Federal Government pays for the support and maintenance of Federal prisoners. Now, it is admitted that this provision in this appropriation bill is a change of existing law. Nobody disputes that. If it be a change of existing law, then it is not in order unless it is in the interest of economy. That also is an indisputable proposition.

My friend from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] meets that question, and says that when we reduce the appropriation from the public Treasury one-half it is in the interest of economy. Let us see whether it is or not. This bill undertakes to appropriate out of two funds over which the Congress of the United States has control. What it fails to appropriate out of one fund is taken from the other; and when it economizes in regard to the public Treasury fund it loads to that extent the other fund which it also controls. Now, is it economy to rob Peter to pay Paul? If it be not so, then this provision is liable to the point of order.

Mr. SPRINGER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] whether under existing law Federal prisoners confined in the jail of the District of Columbia are not now paid for by the Government of the United States?

Mr. HUNTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPRINGER. And we also pay for all the officers and the expenses of running the prison here.

Mr. HUNTON. Now we do.

Mr. SPRINGER. In the States, in regard to prisons outside of the District of Columbia, the Government pays in a like manner for the expense of keeping prisoners sentenced by Federal courts. But the expense of running the jail or the prison is paid by the State. In the case of the District of Columbia a distinction is made against the Government by requiring the Government not only to furnish the prison but to pay for all the officers and the expense of running it, and in addition to that to pay for the keeping of its own prisoners in its own jail.

Mr. HUNTON. I think the gentleman from Illinois is mistaken in one of his statements. When a State agrees to receive Federal prisoners in its prison, they make certain terms, and the Government has to pay an amount equal to the expense of keeping the prisoners, including the cost of the institution. The State of Illinois can refuse to receive any Federal prisoners, but when it does receive them it does so upon terms satisfactory to itself.

Mr. SPRINGER. I find the same provision in relation to Federal prisoners in State jails and prisons that applies to Federal prisoners in the jail of the District of Columbia. The law is the same in regard to both. Section 5545 of the Revised Statutes provides:

Hereafter there shall be allowed and paid by the Attorney-General, for the subsistence of prisoners in the custody of any marshal of the United States and the warden of the jail in the District of Columbia, such sum only as it reasonably and actually costs to subsist them.

Mr. HUNTON. Each State must consent to the arrangement before it receives Federal prisoners in its prisons.

Mr. SPRINGER. I know that, but I cannot see the justice of a provision requiring the Government to keep up a prison in this District and to pay all the expenses of it, and then to pay for the expense of keeping its own prisoners in its own prison.

Mr. ANDERSON. Will the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB] consent now to a motion that the committee rise?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule upon the point of order. The clerk will read from the act providing a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia.

The Clerk read as follows:

The said commissioners shall submit to the Secretary of the Treasury for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and annually thereafter, for his examination and approval, a statement showing in detail the work proposed to be undertaken by them during the fiscal year next ensuing, and the estimated cost thereof; also the cost of constructing, repairing, and maintaining all bridges authorized by law across the Potomac River within the District of Columbia, and also all other streams in said District; the cost of maintaining all public institutions of charity, reformatories, and prisons belonging to or controlled wholly or in part by the District of Columbia, and which are now by law supported wholly or in part by the United States or District of Columbia; and also the expenses of the Washington Aqueduct and its appurtenances; and also an itemized statement and estimate of the amount necessary to defray the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the next fiscal year.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is clearly of the opinion that jails are embraced in the phrase "reformatories and prisons;" and that it was the meaning and intention of that fundamental law that such institutions should be provided for at the joint expense of the Government of the United States and of the District of Columbia. For that reason and in that sense the paragraph of the pending bill now in question is not a change of the law.

The Chair is further of the opinion that if it were a change of law still it would not be subject to a point of order, for the reason that clause 3 of Rule XXI provides—

Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States, by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States, or by the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill: Provided, That it shall be in order further to amend such bill upon the report of the committee having jurisdiction of the subject-matter of such amendment, which amendment, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures.

The Chair is of opinion that the word "expenditures" there used refers to expenditures of the General Government. If heretofore the General Government has paid the entire expense of this institution, and it is now proposed that it shall pay but one-half of such expense, that would be a retrenchment of expenditures from the funds of the General Government. The Chair therefore is of the opinion that the point of order is not well taken, and overrules it.

Mr. HUNTON. I move to strike out the pending paragraph. This provision is an innovation in the appropriation bills for the District of Columbia; and although the Chair has ruled against me on the point of order, I ask the Committee of the Whole to strike out the paragraph, because it is an innovation in respect to the division of expenditures between the District and the General Government. Never until now has any attempt been made (or if made, it has always been unsuccessful) to make the people of the District of Columbia pay for the support of this jail. I repeat the illustration I used a while ago. Take a judicial district of the United States in any of the States in this Union. The judge of that district sends the persons convicted of crime in the district to the Federal prison; every dollar of the expense connected with the punishment of crimes committed in that district, and coming within the jurisdiction of that court, is paid by the Federal Government. Now, I cannot for my life see any distinction between the support of prisoners under such circumstances and the support of prisoners as provided for in this paragraph. The adoption of the paragraph tends to impose upon the people of the District additional burdens. Year by year the effort is made by some persons to increase the burdens of the District—I think improperly. I trust it will be the pleasure of the Committee of the Whole to strike out this paragraph and let this jail be supported as it always has been supported, by appropriations from the Treasury of the United States.

The question being taken upon the motion of Mr. HUNTON to strike out the paragraph, there were—ayes 42, noes 72.

Mr. HUNTON. I call for tellers.

No quorum having voted, tellers were ordered, and Mr. COBB and Mr. HUNTON were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 34, noes 94.

Mr. HUNTON. I make the point that no quorum has voted.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio. I move the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CONVERSE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 7035) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

FEES, ETC., OF CUSTOMS OFFICERS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an abstract of the official fees and emoluments received by customs officers during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880; which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES OF DOMESTIC ANIMALS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Kansas relative to contagious diseases of domestic animals; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, indefinite leave of absence was granted to Mr. TAYLOR, of Tennessee, on account of the serious illness of his wife.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. COVERT, from the Committee on Agriculture, reported a bill (H. R. No. 7099) making appropriations for the Agricultural Department of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted.

Mr. WHITE. I reserve all points of order on that bill.

JUDICIAL DISTRICTS IN LOUISIANA.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. No. 4050) to divide the State of Louisiana into two judicial districts, which has been returned from the Senate with an amendment, be taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection that order will be made.

There was no objection.

MRS. ELMIRA FARNSWORTH.

Mr. CALKINS. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2635) for the relief of Mrs. Almira Farnsworth, and that the same be taken up for consideration.

The bill was read.

Mr. COFFROTH. I object.

HOUR OF DAILY MEETING.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to give notice that in pursuance of an order adopted to-day the House will meet to-morrow, and thereafter for the remainder of the session, at eleven o'clock a. m.

The motion of Mr. SPRINGER was then agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 149) for the printing of 20,000 copies of the Medical and Surgical History of the War of the Rebellion, to report it adversely. I call the attention of my economical friend from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] to these two adverse reports from the Committee on Printing, this and the one made by my friend, the chairman, [Mr. WHYTE.] The printing proposed by this joint resolution would cost $120,000.

Mr. WITHERS. I ask that the joint resolution be placed on the Calendar. I do not think that the question of economy ought to govern us in reference to that particular publication. It is almost the only publication that has ever been made by Congress for the benefit of the medical profession, and it is one which is of a very high order of merit and one which is very much sought after. It is calculated to do a great deal of good, and although we may spend over a hundred thousand dollars for its republication, in my judgment it will be money judiciously expended.

Mr. ANTHONY. Books are always very much sought after that are given away. If this book was printed and sold at the cost of publication, a very few thousand copies I think would answer the public demand, and as this is not a report from the Commissioner of Agriculture I hope we shall have the support of my friend from West Virginia, [Mr. DAVIS.]

Mr. WITHERS. I will say that I have had hundreds of applications from persons who desire to purchase the book, but it cannot be had by purchase.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be placed on the Calendar, with the adverse report of the committee.

COUNT OF ELECTORAL VOTES.

Mr. MORGAN. I am instructed by the Select Committee to take into consideration the state of the law respecting the ascertaining and declaration of the result of the elections of President and Vice-President of the United States to report back the resolution referred to that committee submitted by the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS,] with an amendment. I ask that the resolution and the amendment be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution submitted by Mr. INGALLS on the 26th of January, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate will be ready to receive the House of Representatives in the Senate Chamber on Wednesday February 9, at twelve o'clock meridian, for the purpose of being present at the opening and counting of the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States. That two persons be appointed tellers on the part of the Senate to make a list of the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States as they shall be declared; that the result shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall announce the state of the vote, which shall be entered on the Journals, and if it shall appear that a choice hath been made agreeably to the Constitution, such entry on the Journals shall be deemed a sufficient declaration thereof.
